"Personally, I don't care much about the matter, but just now I'm anxious to stand well with my constituency and with the Legislature, for I'm in the Senatorial fight in my State and want to win out."

"Of course," replied the Senator heartily.

I thought it wise to get these two men off this subject, for it was one upon which Robert was very sore and anxious, so I asked, by way of changing the venue:

"What's this story I hear about Senator Depew and the Frederick City delegation? Why has there been such a laugh about it among you?"

"Well, you see, Mrs. Slocum, the city of Frederick has had a claim against the Government growing out of the Civil War, and a delegation came down the other day to look after it. They've been coming down regularly for about thirty years or more upon this same matter. Well, they went before the Committee as usual, only this time they encountered Depew and talked with him, and

BORATED TALCUM
Toilet Powder

Is the greatest scientific discovery ever made for the instant relief of prickly heat, sunburn and rash, chafed skin, chapped hands, etc. Its many merits have made possible a success unequaled by any other toilet powder in the world. Its great sales have aroused a number of worthless imitations which are cheap but dangerous. The only genuine has a picture of Gerhard Mennen, the inventor, on the top. Take no other.

Mennen's Borated Talcum Toilet Powder

Makes the beginning of a baby's life comfortable. It allays all burning, itching, pain, soothes the slightest irritation of tender skin, gives undisturbed sleep, promotes health as well as happiness.

Mennen's Borated Talcum Toilet Powder

Is invaluable to shavers. Its unequaled antiseptic properties prevents razor rash and other irritation. Its soothing effects quiet the discomforts arising from tender skin, close shaving or impure soap.

Mennen's Borated Talcum Toilet Powder

Provides the necessary elements that enter into a woman's toilet, and which a woman alone can thoroughly understand and appreciate.

ROCHESTER OPTICAL CO., 59 South St., Rochester, N.Y.

Depew became quite enthusiastic over Frederick and her claims. He promised his full cooperation in the matter and promised all sorts of things, so the story goes, and then, overflowing with good-fellowship, he thought that he would show his cordiality in other ways than by his expansive smile. So, in an unguarded moment, he asked about the old story of Barbara Frietchie. This, of course, unlocked the tongue of every one of the delegation and the tale was graphically related. Depew was delighted, and declared that Frederick's claim ought to be paid if for no other reason than Barbara's act of bravery. But, alas! he added benignly:

"'The story and the poem were always favorites with me in my childhood.'

"Fancy the astonishment on the faces of that delegation at this remarkable statement. They were blank with wonderment. Finally some one timidly intimated to Depew that he must have been an astoundingly old little boy for the story and poem to have been favorites with him in childhood. It dawned on him suddenly that he must be away off on Barbara Frietchie, and he said promptly:

"'Why, bless me! I thought that Barbara Frietchie was a heroine of 1812. I'll confess I was a bit puzzled that Stonewall Jackson should be figuring in 1812, but then I thought that perhaps Stonewall Jackson was only a slip for Andrew Jackson. The slip is mine.'"

"It would seem then," said I, "that the golden-tongued Senator is not always entirely happy in his utterances, especially in those pertaining to poets and poems. In the course of an address before the Longfellow memorial meeting not long since, I understand that he remarked: 'Paradise Lost is the greatest poem in English literature, because nobody ever reads it.'

"Now, it seems that this utterance came to the ears of those poor, sightless ones who frequent the reading-room for the blind up at the library, for I heard a sweet-faced old lady say pathetically when the remark was repeated to her:

"'Think of his saying that! Why, Milton was blind! He was not only a truly great poet, but he was blind!' And she turned her sightless gaze toward me for sympathy."

The Senator spoke up warmly:

"Depew would not hurt anybody's feelings intentionally for the world."

The Sergeant of Company L

By Clinton Ross

IT WAS Bertie's way, to be late," Mrs. Davidge, the hostess, remarked, and they would not wait longer.

"To think—of that poor, dear boy—and we never estimated him at half his value," the hostess was saying. She might have added, to be explicit, at more that half his moral and mental value; for Captain Robertson's monetary value was considerable, and he was of a good old New York family. But until the Spanish War he had gone in for the things men of his sort affect, and it was surprising to note that he had distinguished himself at Santiago, and that he had—through influence, the skeptics said—secured an appointment in the Philippines, and distinguished himself there. This was the man who was returning to his old environment with Mrs. Davidge's dinner.

As it happened, our one-armed Captain entered at the moment, and there was handshaking all around, and "Awfully glad to see you, old man," and "How was it out there? do tell me. I am going to put my globe-trotting in that direction." And the women said, "So glad to see you, Bertie." And the ever-present Tatterly made his witticism. It was Tatterly, you know, who made the remark that war was sent to give the leaven, earnestness, to good society.

As he still had his right hand, our Captain went through this very well, until he came to Kate—in some way she was last—and he gave her a quick, deep look that made her flush, and then Mrs. Davidge said:

"You won't object to taking Miss Merton in?"

"Do you object, Kate?" he whispered.

"Why, of course not; don't be foolish," the girl said. And so they went in.

"And how is everybody, and Meadowbrook and Ardsley? I hear that Bob Stoners broke his collar-bone again."

"Third time," Tatterly remarked.

"Oh, all is about the same," Kate answered.

She did not understand him. His light, whimsical face had become earnest, as if he had looked into life. Did he care still? For some reason her feminine intuition failed her. And she had thought she knew him and would continue to know him like a book. She suddenly saw that she wasn't exactly pleased at the thought of his not caring. And, indeed, he directed more of his talk than was necessary to Helen Delton.

They talked of Manila and the life there, and Robertson told many a story; and the women said it must be great fun. "Yes, life was interesting," he went on; "but it was the time of war, you know." And he told how one day he had dined with Mrs. Colonel M., and how the dance had been broken up by the news that Colonel M. had been shot in a landing from a gunboat.

"But the excitement and the fun of it!" Helen Delton cried; "the things we do here seem so tame after all that."

Our hero remarked that even excitement palls sometimes, which they doubted; and the men quite envied the one-time Bertie.

After dinner the talk turned to bravery, and Captain Robertson was asked nonsensical questions, and how it seems to be under fire, and all that sort of thing, and if there was anything in Stephen Crane's book that people talked so much about a few years ago. Kate caught herself thinking that the hero bore his honors very modestly—not that the old Bertie had been without modesty. When they asked about his own story, which the newspapers had dilated on, he said at first little or nothing—and then Kate caught his eyes. She now was across the room from him, but his eyes were on her. He seemed singularly grave.

"Oh, I say," he cried suddenly, "don't talk about that. The newspaper stories are all stuff—entirely wrong. I have made my explanation now; I am sorry that I didn't make it in Manila."

He spoke almost fiercely, and the others looked at him curiously.

"You ask me about bravery. Most of the talk about it is nonsense—tommy-rot, to use forcible slang. I was praised for going up San Juan Heights. Do you know, I was afraid—yes, afraid. I would have run, if I hadn't been more afraid of being called a coward. That is all there was of it. I wanted to run, but it took less courage to keep on than to run. And as for the skirmishes I have been through in Luzon, I have always had much the same feeling. To be sure, there are men bred to the thing, and others who have it in them, and a few, a very few, who don't care. But I know I am not the only man of the kind that wants to run but doesn't dare to. That is not bravery."

"Oh, my dear Bertie, you can't tell us that."

But Bertie was looking at Miss Merton.

"You all have been good enough to ask me questions about that affair of Deloa. Now, I am going to tell you the truth, just as it was.

"You know, I was First Lieutenant of Company L. It chanced that the First Sergeant was Jack Flynn, the son of the farmer at our place in Far Westchester. The Flynns have been associated with our family, father and son, since my grandfather's time, and when I found Jack in my company we both, I think, were pleased—at any rate, I was. He was a splendid fellow and had in him the making of an officer.

"Well, the regiment, and Company L., of course, were in those things that you perhaps read about—or, perhaps, didn't read about, after the first novelty had worn off—they became so frequent. I often thought how much better a commissioned officer Jack would have made than I. And all the time, in all those little skirmishes we were in—I will be honest with you—I never could get quite familiar with being under fire. I never felt the battle rage, you know.

"Well, to return to Deloa. We made a landing one morning under the cover of the guns at Manate Bay, and occupied the town of Manate. A spy brought us news that an important Filipino, a General Aristo, was near by, up country, and a detachment of cavalry, with which was Company L., was sent out to scour for him. We believed there was no great force of the enemy in the immediate neighborhood.

"Indeed, on our way, following a jungle road, we saw only a few natives, who claimed to be amigos, as is their way, you know. Presently, after some tiresome miles, we came out into a region of ricefields and to a little village on a hill, where was an abandoned monastery and a curious old stone church. Here I was detailed to remain with thirty men, for the road forked, and it was a point to watch. With me was Sergeant Flynn.

"We took our position about an old storehouse on a hillock at the upper end of the village, which commanded the roads. Here was a fenced inclosure and mounds which, if we were attacked, might prove a fair breastworks. Then, leaving Flynn, I dismounted, and, with a few men, went down into the village. Before the little church we were met by an old man, who, with many protestations of his loyalty, said that he knew where that rogue, General Aristo, was—that he was hidden there, and he pointed to a house. The matter, of course, bore investigation, and we surrounded the building, while I and two men went in. There was a scene of fright and stolid lying, but out of a dark loft one of my men pulled by the leg a little Filipino. I was quite elated.

"'Why, General,' said I, for he had been an envoy during a truce, 'this is a surprise.'

"He shouted out unutterable things in Spanish at me and then fell courteous; for he was a man of education and of a good Filipino family, as a lot of those chaps are.

"After rummaging about the church and the monastery and getting what information we could, we retired to our position on the hill. We were led to believe that the enemy had utterly decamped. Yet Aristo's presence perplexed me. Why had he remained here to watch us—to see with his own eyes?

"Almost at the moment a trooper came cantering up. The enemy were coming in force up the Manate road.

"He was followed quickly by two more of our scouts, who reported that hundreds were swarming down from both of the other ways. Then a popping began from the fields. We understood; we were cut off.

"General Aristo, with a malicious smile, calmly lit a Manila cigar.

"My men were kneeling behind the fence and now popping away. One poor chap tumbled over at my right, and I began to feel that battle fear I have told you about. They swarmed about us from every side; but we kept replying—to good effect, too. But it seemed to me we couldn't hold out. It was a useless struggle, a useless sacrifice. Two others of ours tumbled over.

"'Sergeant,' I said, 'we can't hold out.'

"'Yes, we can, sir; we're not going to give in to 'em niggers—when we have the prize, too!'

"'We must,' I said, pulling out a handkerchief. He snatched it from me.

"'Well done, Hawkins,' he commented, as a trooper knocked over a Filipino; and then to me, 'Sir, we can't.'

"And he looked at me with an expression of dismay and shame I never shall forget—the well-disciplined non-commissioned officer's shame at an inefficient superior.

"And I obeyed him. From that moment Sergeant Flynn commanded, not I.

"The next quarter-hour, to put it bluntly, was hell, and then my arm felt numb, the one I haven't now, and it all was dark, until at last I awoke, looking into a doctor's eyes.

"'Where am I?'

"'At Manate. You bagged the man, and kept him until Colonel Welling came up. Don't try to talk.'

"'And the men?'

"'Five dead and thirteen laid up.'

"'Sergeant Flynn?'

"'It's a pretty bad go with him.'

"'He did it,' I remember I said.

"'Hush!' said the surgeon, with a knowing smile.

"Well, my arm was amputated, and I was congratulated, and written up, and commended, and promoted," Robertson continued, almost bitterly.

"And poor Flynn was lying between life and death for many weeks. When I was able I went to see him. This was in Manila. His gallantry, too, had received mention. But no one knew that if it had not been for him we never should have held out, and until to-day—when I have written the facts to the Department—I never have told it. I saw him, the wreck of a strong man, and sure of death.

"'You did it; not I, Jack,' I told him.

"'Hush, sir; hush!' he said, like the surgeon; 'you only thought you wanted to give in.'"

The narrator paused, and the hush kept the room, until one said:

"Well?"

"That's all. Flynn died a few days after."

The talk clung politely about Manila for a little while and then turned to other matters.

Miss Merton had listened, her eyes never leaving the speaker's face. Shortly after she found herself alone with Captain Robertson.

"Bertie, I once told you you were a dawdler. I was wrong. You are a strong, brave man."

Captain Robertson took her half-extended hand and pressed it.

"Looking at you made me tell it," he said.

But Tatterly, commenting on the Captain's story later at the club, remarked:

"I don't see why the deuce he wanted to tell that sort of thing."

"BERTIE, I ONCE TOLD YOU YOU WERE A DAWDLER. I WAS WRONG. YOU ARE A STRONG, BRAVE MAN"

"Freshwater" Colleges

By D. K. Pearsons

THE greatest educational institution in America, aside from the common school, is the "freshwater" college. My faith in this agent of civilization is strong, and it is in no boastful sense that I point to the fact that it has been the chief joy of a long and happy life to prove that faith by my works—by giving to seventeen colleges of this kind two and a half million dollars. This will indicate to the business man that my enthusiasm on the subject of "freshwater" colleges is not an idle sentiment, and that I must be able to give a substantial reason for the faith that is in me.

First, let us define the term "freshwater." I understand it to mean, as applied to an institution for instruction in the higher branches of learning, that such establishment is laid out upon collegiate lines, but is far more unpretending than the big university or the large college. It may, according to my understanding, be located on the sea coast or be dignified by the title of University and still be a "freshwater" college. Therefore, let us take this term—very likely first applied in a contemptuous sense—to mean a college that lacks the proportions and pretensions of those great institutions of higher education to which those who can have the pick of the land are sent.

The big colleges and universities with world-wide reputations are all right; I have no quarrel whatever with them. They are fulfilling their own purpose well; but I believe that this country could better afford to see them wiped off the list of her educational facilities than to have the struggling "freshwater" colleges that dot the West and South removed from the reach of the common people.

Why? Because these humble institutions are direct products of the true American pioneer spirit, and still have in them the vital breadth of high moral purpose breathed into them by their founders; because the foundation of every "freshwater" college in the land is laid deep in the rock of sound, practical Christianity; because these are the only schools of higher education within the reach of a very large and a very representative class of young men and women—those who make up the moral backbone of this nation.

Examine this last consideration and its force will instantly become clear, so it seems to me. To a very great extent this is merely a question of geography. Almost invariably the "freshwater" colleges have been established to meet local needs. Generally speaking, so far as the West is considered, they are remote from the big centres of civilization where the great universities are located. They were started because they were needed by the inhabitants of the surrounding country. Take, for example, one of the numerous "freshwater" colleges in Iowa. When that splendid prairie State began to "settle up," and the virgin soil was turned into marvelously productive fields, which yielded the settler a rich return for his hard labor, the pioneer faced this situation: His older children had exhausted the resources of the district and the village schools; they were eager to get a fair start in life, a better equipment than the town high school could afford them; their hopes and ambitions turned toward the college, but this goal seemed hopelessly remote, for the nearest college was hundreds of miles away and the expense of railroad fare seemed more than could be managed, to say nothing of the outlay for tuition, books and living expenses—not an encouraging prospect for a farmer boy with a slender purse and the knowledge that he must make his own way, and that he could have only two or three years of college life, at most.

The Pioneers' Cry for Education

Nor was the outlook any brighter for the conscientious father of a growing family, who longed to give his boys and girls the advantages of a far better education than had come within his own grasp. Many a sturdy settler has nursed a protracted heartache because his struggle to get his farm clear from debt compelled him to deny his children this precious boon. Hundreds of pioneers have counted this among the greatest of their griefs; and in every pioneer community hundreds of young men and women went out into the battle of life with a deep and abiding hunger for a better education—a craving that could not be satisfied, because the nearest college was beyond their reach. Had there been an institution of higher education within a hundred, or even three hundred miles from their home town, they could have overcome the other obstacles standing between them and the benefits of an education. This intervening distance, however, became the "great gulf fixed" that effectually separated them from the realization of their ambition.

Heartaches of this kind, in the breasts of both parents and children, were the springs in which the "freshwater" college movement had its rise. This condition at least richly prepared the ground for the coming of the forerunner of the college. Often he was a missionary of the gospel, who saw this hunger for intellectual food in the mind of the pioneer population and determined that he would dedicate himself to the work of satisfying it. He also perceived the opportunity to teach the principles of Christianity along with secular learning. Here was set before him the double joy of laboring for both the spiritual salvation and the intellectual freedom of a people eager to make the most of their opportunities.

No wonder this kind of a field called out the best talents of the pioneer ministry and inspired a devotion and self-sacrifice which shame most of the heroic performances of the characters pictured by the professional romancers! There have been hundreds of instances of this kind, but a single one will do by way of illustration.

A Plain College with No Frills

Out in Colorado Springs is a college to which hundreds of students flock with a consuming thirst for an education. Ah! What a sturdy set those fellows are! The gathering of the clans at the Colorado Springs College is one of the most inspiring sights that any true American can wish to look upon. Why, those boys stalk into that town, with their "duds" rolled into little bundles that they have "packed" on their own shoulders, from ranches and mining camps two hundred and even three hundred miles away. If there is a millionaire's son among them you can't pick him out by the cut of his clothes. They are men—not dudes! I guess about half of them could brand a steer or tend a sluice with better grace than they could appear at a full-dress party. But how they do study!

Well, this college is an example of what I have said is the typical history of the "freshwater" college. It must have been nearly thirty-five years ago when I pitched camp almost on its site in company with a band of Ute Indians. There was an insignificant little hamlet on the spot where the city of Colorado Springs now stands. The situation and the surroundings were glorious, and it seemed to me that there was a great future for that region. And my guess was right. The settlement grew and the inhabitants prospered. One day an earnest and devoted Christian missionary came along. He read the hearts of the people—or at least a part of them. Instantly he saw that the great need of that community was a college. Even the most well-to-do settlers could not afford to send their children hundreds of miles away to the nearest big college. Among the more thoughtful members of the community his ambition to build a college there met with a warm response and he went at the project with a will. In a way, he succeeded. I believe his institution was at first called an academy, but soon it joined the ranks of "freshwater" colleges. From the start it trained men—good, sound men who became the preachers, lawyers, merchants, editors, school teachers, school commissioners and legislators of that country.

But the haste to get rich and to pile up money with which to spoil sons and daughters is just as common a failing of men in that part of the country as elsewhere, and the missionary found this out, to his grief. It was hard sledding for him to keep the pioneer college going. Finally it passed into the hands of a young man named Slocum. He was full of good business snap, and I saw he was the man to make that thing go as the missionary had not been able to make it. I said to him: "When you raise $150,000 for the endowment of this college I will pay you $50,000 in cash to bring the total up to $200,000."

He seemed to appreciate the offer, but said plainly that he didn't believe the condition could be fulfilled. However, he went at the task with a hearty good will. It took some time, but finally he forwarded to me a book containing the names of one thousand men who had pledged a total of $150,000 for the college, and the reliability of the list was certified to by three of the leading business men there. Mr. Slocum received his $50,000 from me, and now that college is the joy and the pride of the whole region. There are no frills on it—just a plain "freshwater" college—but it is placing a higher education within reach of hundreds of manly young fellows from the plains and the mountains, who would have been compelled to forego such a training if that institution had not been established and maintained as I have described.

Tall Timber in the Ozark Mountains

To emphasize and enforce the statement that sound Christianity and genuine pioneer pluck have gone into the making of almost every "freshwater" college, let me give another illustration just as typical as that which I have already cited. Almost in the heart of the Ozark Mountains, in Missouri, is another college which I found in the same situation as the one at Colorado Springs. Years before, a courageous missionary who had received his education at Olivet—another "freshwater" institution—came into that region and beheld the identical outlook which had inspired the "gospel scout" to build a college where I had camped with the Utes.

D. K. PEARSONS

The fact that Missouri had been a border State and a slave State made the situation woefully disheartening. To say the least, education had not been fashionable there, and it took courage for this man Drury to undertake the building of a college in the shadows of the Ozarks. But he finally succeeded, and I am glad his name has been given to the institution. Although scores of young men and women there secured an excellent education, the inhabitants were slow to wake up to the value of the college and open their pockets for its support. At length it became impossible to pay the salaries of the small force of teachers with promptness and regularity; indeed, it required very skillful begging to pay them at all. Affairs were in this condition when I made the management the same proposal which Mr. Slocum had received. The whole faculty and leading men of the community took hold and hustled, and I had the pleasure of adding $50,000 to an endowment fund of $150,000. What was the result? More students than they knew what to do with!

No consideration with reference to the "freshwater" college is of greater weight than that which makes account of the timber that goes into institutions of this order. With rare exceptions, the pupils have their own way to make and are absolutely dependent upon their earnings for all their college money. In hundreds of instances young men are compelled to contribute to the support of their families while working their way through college. This is severe experience, but it helps to grow sound timber as nothing else can.

There is another element in the results accomplished by the "freshwater" college not found in anything like an equal degree in the bigger institutions. This is the cultivation of the real spirit of American democracy. At Berea College, in Kentucky, most of the students are mountaineers. They have good stuff in them, coming from a Scotch-Irish parentage. In most cases they are desperately poor and as a class are also desperately ignorant—but they have the blood of heroes.

Back in the days of the Civil War the fathers and grandfathers of the young men and women now in Berea came down from their mountain homes with their hearts full of the love of freedom and fought like tigers for the Union cause. These were the men who led the forces at the scaling of Lookout Mountain and carried the Union colors to its top although raked by the awful fire. My sympathies are always with the mountain men because I am a mountaineer myself. The only difference between my situation and that of the men in the Cumberland region was that I shoveled snow in the mountains of Vermont while they were hunting and tending corn patches south of Mason and Dixon's line. I had little to boast of in the way of educational advantage over them.

Large families are the rule among the mountaineers and this intensifies the demand for education. The delight with which these people welcome an opportunity to give their children an education is pathetic. They were almost wild with joy when I gave to Berea $50,000 to complete a $200,000 endowment. How many of the students in this institution could have gone to another and a distant college in the event that this had not been established? Not one per cent. of them! And I will venture to say that there is not a college or university in America where the standard of manhood and womanhood is higher than at Berea.

Benefits of Individual Instruction

Not the least important thing about the "freshwater" college is the fact that it affords opportunity for a closer relationship between instructor and pupil than is possible in the larger institution where the number of pupils is so much larger. This ministers to both the moral and the intellectual progress of the pupil. Each student receives a larger share of individual attention from the teacher, and the latter has a more intimate knowledge of the conduct and the character of each of his students than he could have in the big institution. The intimacy of this relationship naturally acts as a wholesome restraint and keeps many a young man from getting into mischief, bad habits and bad associations. As it looks to me, the "freshwater" student does more studying, has more pleasure, is closer to his teachers and his mates, and suffers less from high pressure athletic distractions than does the student at the big institution.

For these and many other reasons I believe that no educational work of an advanced kind is being done in America to-day equal to that of the "freshwater" colleges.

The Crime of '73

By Stanley Waterloo

THEY weren't Nihilists. What's the reason anybody says they were Nihilists! It drives me into a frenzy when everybody jumps upon everybody else and accuses them of all sorts of things. It may be that nobody said anything about anybody else, just now, but that doesn't matter. I want to repeat that they weren't Nihilists. They were only Freshmen of the Class of '73. Nevertheless, they meant business!

They were gathered together in a room, and they swore secrecy and all that sort of thing. Here is something that only a small portion of the world knows and which all the world ought to know, because, really, because we ought to know more particularly about our young men who are blossoming in the colleges. Well, here's an important matter: no Freshman can, or, rather, may, could or should carry a cane. This important fact has dribbled, in a way, into the minds of the populace, through vagrant articles in the various periodicals, within the last quarter of a century. It is a fact, though, that the articles were incompetent and that the public doesn't know yet. I, the thoughtful and gifted writer of this story, have departed, for once, from my dignity, and am standing, so to speak, on the street corner of a crowded city, and am announcing that the populace does not yet know why Freshmen should not carry a cane. Neither does anybody else. Come to think of it, after you have taken off the populace, "anybody else" seems out of the question.

There were about a dozen of them and the freshman year was getting very near its close. For a Freshman to carry a cane before Commencement and before he becomes a Sophomore is, as known in college history, to make him—and very properly—a malefactor of the deepest dye, one upon whom the retiring Sophomores, who are about to become Juniors and drift into the one year of college nonentity, have a right to inflict the direst injuries.

Now such is the depravity of freshman human nature that, toward the end of the collegiate year, certain members of the freshman class almost inevitably conclude that a cane shall be carried before the collegiate year be ended.

To say that the meeting here described was "serious" would be doing it an injustice. It was too mightily earnest to enable the adjective "serious" to fit the case. It was a meeting such as gathered of the few when a new scheme of effort against the Asiatic continent was afloat in Greece, when Rome was imperiled, when Venice was finding letters in the Lions' mouths. It was a meeting to determine Who should carry a cane before the end of the freshman year; and lots were to be cast as to the issue. Now, lots have been cast many times in history, but to the young gentlemen here assembled all lot-castings of the past were, for the moment, insignificant. There were formulas with an urn, and there were what are popularly known as "bated breaths." The lot fell upon Jim Cameron.

He, this James Cameron, was at the same time the proudest and, in one sense, the most scared youth between the seas—that is, to get down to a practicality, between the Atlantic and the Pacific Oceans. He knew that Glory awaited him; he knew, also, that he was going to his Doom. He set his teeth hard and tried to retain his usual somewhat hilarious demeanor. It's mighty hard to be a hero. This young man knew very well that he was like the leader—what was his name?—at Thermopylæ, that he was the Bozzaris of a latter day, that he was William Tell, that he was the "Make Way for Liberty" fellow, Arnold Winkelried, that he was all of that group of heroes who stood high—but it didn't help matters much. It's all very well to be a martyr, but there is no doubt that most fellows have wriggled most unbecomingly at the stake.

Cameron was wriggling already, for Sophomores are ruthless beings and the Freshmen knew in their heart of hearts that they were in the wrong. But "the die was cast," literally, and Cameron must get a cane and carry it. Not only must he get a cane, but he must make a trip of forty miles to a greater city in order to get a cane of the right sort, an article described by one of his unscathed companions as something with "just the proper touch" to it; then he must carry it flauntingly through the main street leading up to the university as far as the Fates would allow him to go, until the heavens fell and the earth collapsed and there were fragments of things.

Now Cameron, though proud and happy, as one who has just been elected in a damp downstairs place to assassinate the Czar of Russia, knew neither how to buy a cane nor how to carry a cane, and his railroad trip was one equally of meditation, financiering and some apprehension. He walked for hours from one place where canes were sold to another place where canes were sold, and finally, thinking of architecture and of art, and of colors and of bric-à-brac, and of how much money he had, he bought a cane. It was really a charming cane. It was of straight, streaked Malacca, with a carved ivory handle extending jauntily at a right angle. It was a gifted cane and had an optimistic and hopeful expression to it. How little there is in expression, how little did that Cane know regarding the date of its dissolution, decease and distribution, how little could the cleverest actuary of the biggest insurance company foretell regarding its demise! Still, it was a most fascinating cane. The Freshman and the Cane, or rather the Cane and the Freshman, took the train for the university. Somewhat to the surprise of this one passenger, the train acted almost as it did when he came down. There was the Cane, elegant Cane, with him on one side, but the train didn't seem to wobble on that side any more than on the other, and he could not understand it. But then his thoughts got lost in the maze of the immediate and certainly turbulent future; he thought of "Ave, Cæsar, morituri te salutamus," and finally settled down to the more modern phrase, "He seen his duty and he done it." And the train rolled on and was not wrenched from the track by the weight of the Cane.

There was another midnight meeting at which the Cane in all its glory was revealed,

Drawn by R. F. Outcault

Well, he went strutting up the street and in which the Freshman, soon himself to become a Sophomore, somewhat pallid but with a face of steel, a trifle shaky as to the hands, announced that on the forthcoming day he would carry that Cane up Ninth Street. He knew that he had no right to carry that Cane up Ninth Street on the next day, or, as he expressed it, "on the day hard by," and the others knew it quite as well as he.

The entire Freshman class knew it. They knew that they had no more right to flaunt a cane in the face of the atmosphere than any one of them had a right to hit Mrs. John Smith in the face. They knew that they were "brave and burly," as some one said, but, as still another remarked: "In our midst stalks the swordsman of our conscience. What right have we to carry a cane! We are only sacrificing Cameron. What show have we got in an unholy cause!" Yet they all decided to fight, to try to defend the Cane, so that henceforth it might be known in history that one Freshman had at one time in the history of one university sported a cane before Commencement.

As for the bearer of that Cane, he lolled around throughout the day, pallid and apathetic. He had got into that frame of mind which, judging from the accounts written by intelligent historians, the pampered victims of the Aztec stone altars lapsed into even weeks before the High Priest, with a dull stone knife, was compelled to find where their hearts were. He was in a comatose but heroic condition. He knew that on the morning "nearly adjacent," as a blithesome but somewhat too frivolous member of his class remarked, he must march up a certain street. He knew that behind him would lurk a majority of his class, knowing that they were abetting a wrong, and therefore weak, as ever the sinful should be. He knew that somewhere, long before he reached the university, would appear either the Sophomore class or segments of it and that he, personally, would be its objective point.

He had read about the death watch that is established in the jails when some murderer is to be hanged, and he murmured within himself: "Why doesn't some one of those fellows give me a death watch!"

The earth turned from west to east after the fashion we all know it has got into, and there were no clouds between it and the uprising and everlasting wooing sun. In other words, it was a fine forenoon, and it was at eleven o'clock A. M., also A. D. 1870, that one Cameron, carrying a cane, started thenceforth and henceforth also (as one of his friends remarked) up the main street of the university town. The earth seemed to revolve as usual and the sun grinned at it as usual, as far as the Freshman could see, but there was blood in the air and everybody felt it! Cameron stalked on.

It would be a gross injustice to the Sophomore class to say that it did not know its business, know it distinctly, accurately and definitely. That Sophomore class had, somehow, become well informed of the Cane affair, and a majority of those of its members who owned brawn were awaiting the Thing with a cane and whatever might be supporting him.

Very well, he, the Thing, was nothing but a young gentleman aged nineteen, the exploiter of the arrogance of the Freshman class. He knew that anything might happen, that he might be burned at the stake, that anything conceivable in the matter of torture might be applied to him—yet he walked on! Behind him came somewhere near a hundred young gentlemen who felt, in the bottom of their hearts, that their business in life was to support this particular young gentleman with the Cane, or die in the supporting. Yet, also, in the bottom of their hearts, they felt that they had no right to engage in the business. This spirit was what was in the group behind the young man carrying the Cane jauntily there. They felt full of fight, but they felt guilty. Somehow, the lurking preponderance of conscience, which is so clinging, got into the minds of these young men.

Well, he went strutting up the street. He knew that various ghastly things were with him, he knew that behind him were the members of his own class, and though what degree of healthy viciousness was within them he did not know, yet he counted on it in a measure. They might fight like demons, or they might run away. He knew that in front of him, around these embowered streets, there lurked everywhere a lot of Sophomores who proposed to gobble him up. Now—this is a tale of truth—this is what happened.

Very well. "Very well" is good just here, because "very well" is a necessity in telling this, casually, and of this casualty.

It took in only three streets. It did not require much, since, on the part of the Sophomores, they were massed learnedly on the three streets. Necessarily, they must jump on this young man in the middle street.

Very well. The Freshman was walking jauntily with his Cane. Eh! but it was a good cane, with its deflection from end to end, half interlining growth, growth made under earnest suns in Oriental countries, and its top of right-angled white ivory. What was the matter with the Cane and this Dreamer of Dreams!

Here is a proposition to be made, with all obeisance and request for endurance in the world. It is to the effect that a good fight is a good fight!

Then suddenly—came about two to one as against the Sophomores, and two to one against the Freshmen. Ordinarily there are two Freshmen to one Sophomore in numbers, but, practically, when it comes to fighting a good fight, there are two Sophomores to one Freshman.

Huh! It was all over in a few minutes! Sophomores all over the world are vain and wicked things, but, in this instance, they were fighting for the right. There was a vast entanglement, a desperate struggle, and then, when the end came, a licked lot of Freshmen.

In the midst of this black fray Cameron struggled valiantly to his feet. There seemed a time for a moment when the Sophomores were yielding to the impact of the charging Freshmen that hope might yet remain, and in that vital moment Cameron, holding his isolated own, waved his Cane as far aloft as he could reach and shouted hoarsely the war-cry of his class.

The Cane wobbled upward for a moment, like the oriflamme of France, or whatever was equivalent to the oriflamme, when little Pepin the Stout was hammering the Huns or somebody else, like the white plume of Henry of Navarre, like Lord Marmion's falcon, but alas!

"Then darkly closed the war around;
Like pinetree rooted from the ground
It sank among the foe."

Strenuous and fearful was it all, but there could be no doubt as to the issue of the struggle. As Cameron sank again beneath the fiery onslaught his mind grasped wildly at but one idea, that of the inherent weakness of his cause—and he felt an impulse to say, "It is better to be right than be President," but he said nothing, perhaps because of the fact that some one was sitting upon his head, in much the fashion affected by sympathetic bystanders when a horse falls in the street.

Above and around Cameron the fray went on, and, gradually, "'73" was driven from the field, as Cameron could hear in a way, though now bearing the weight of four Sophomores who sat upon him as upon a log. Then his captors returned in force and danced a wild measure around him while his class cap was cut into pieces, slight scraps of the size of a quarter of a dollar being pinned upon the breast of each one of the victors.

Men have been boiled in oil. People have been burned at the stake. What would immediately happen to Cameron, this venturesome criminal of criminals, was a matter of doubt. A young man with four men sitting upon him necessarily breathes a flattened-out breath, and thinks a flattened-out thought. Cameron knew himself that he was thinking a flattened-out thought and, therefore, was probably not safe as to conclusions—it must be borne in mind that these were all matters of the instant. What Cameron saw and heard was that a large Sophomore with red whiskers, quite apart from the Sophomores who were sitting upon him, was leaping excitedly up and down and shouting out:

"Fry him! Fry him!"

Meanwhile his dishevelment was going forward steadily. Portions of his raiment were being distributed. The four Sophomores sitting upon him seemed rather stolid and meditative than otherwise. They were the mutes, the directors, while around them raged the active forces of the vengeful Inquisition. They sat there quiet, thoughtful, reflective, heavy, while Cameron's stomach burrowed softly but impressively into the dust of the street.

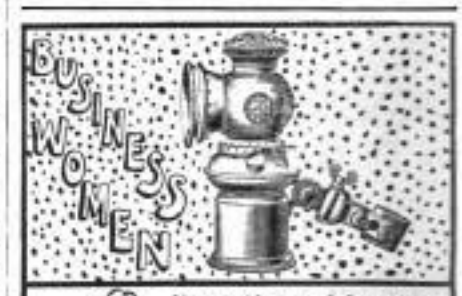
Well, they didn't kill him. Undoubtedly, from the Sophomore standpoint, they should have done so, but they didn't. Many a time in the history of the universities of the United States has this neglectful missing of murder come regretfully to the minds of Sophomores. Cameron, at least what was left of Cameron, was allowed to depart, taking his way toward where, far up the street, hung threateningly, but inefficient, like the Highlanders upon Ben Levin's height, the shattered fragments of the Freshman class. He was not beautiful. No one could, or did, call him so, chiefly because he was, to a somewhat extraordinary extent, in what the society writers call "dishabille." In fact, he was the most "dishabillish" young man existing upon this continent at that moment between St. Augustine, Florida, U. S. A., and Portland, Oregon, U. S. A.

Yet, as this relic of humanity went blundering up the street, there came to him suddenly a renaissance, a recrudescence, a reflorescence, a re—anything you please—of all his manhood. Arnold Winkelreid indeed! Arnold garnered a few spears into his bosom, it is true, but Arnold Winkelreid died! Cameron had to live, and how on earth he had drawn breath under circumstances just precedent he did not know. He only knew that he had suffered and lived, when it would have been easier to die, while the rest of his class had simply lived. With every step he took there came to him an unconscious increase of jauntiness—with a limp, of course, but still jauntiness. What mattered it that his class cap had disappeared into trophies to be worn upon the breasts of temporary tyrants? What mattered anything, he thought, as he took his first full breath of air.

The vista away up the street included a large proportion of his class—a pretty well banged-up proportion, too. He approached them limpingly, but, as has been expressed, with a certain air about him. In the hollow of his hand, lay they! He knew it, and they knew it! Why, this plain, unpretending Freshman had martyrs' crowns to sell—or give away!

The Student in Germany

IN THE German parks there are especial seats labeled, "Only for grown-ups" (Nur für Erwachsene), and the German small boy, anxious to sit down, who reads that notice, passes by and hunts for a seat on which children are permitted to rest, and there he seats himself, careful not to touch the woodwork with his muddy boots. Imagine a seat in any American park labeled, "Only for grown-ups!" Every child for five miles around would be trying to get on that seat, and hauling other children off who were on. As for any "grown-up," he would never be able to get within half a mile of that seat for the crowd. The German small boy, who has accidentally sat down on such without noticing, rises with a start when his error is pointed out to him, and goes away with downcast head, blushing to the roots of his hair with shame and regret.



The only individual throughout Germany who ever dreams of taking liberties with the law is the German student, and he only to a certain well-defined point. By custom certain privileges are permitted to him, but even these are strictly limited and clearly understood. For instance, the German student may get drunk and fall asleep in the gutter with no other penalty than that of having to tip the next morning the policeman who finds him and brings him home. But for this purpose he must choose the gutters of side streets.

The German student, conscious of the rapid approach of oblivion, uses all his remaining energy to get around the corner, where he may collapse without anxiety. In certain districts he may ring bells. The rent of flats in these localities is lower than in other quarters of the town; while the difficulty is further met by each family preparing for itself a secret code of bell-ringing by means of which it is known whether the summons is genuine or not. When visiting such a household late at night it is well to be acquainted with this code, or you may, if persistent, get a bucket of water thrown over you.

Also, the German student is allowed to put out lights at night, but there is a prejudice against his putting out too many. The larky German student generally keeps count, contenting himself with half a dozen lights per night. Likewise, he may shout and sing as he walks home up till half-past two; and at certain restaurants it is permitted to him to put his arm around the Fraulein's waist. To prevent any suggestion of unseemliness, the waitresses at restaurants frequented by students are always carefully selected from among a staid and elderly class of women, by reason of which the German student can enjoy the delights of flirtation without fear and without reproach to any one.

They are a law-abiding people, the Germans.

Famous Feats of Journalism

The "Beat" on The Victoria Disaster

By David Graham Phillips

TOWARD four o'clock in the morning of June 23, 1893, the Portuguese Minister at the Court of St. James was driving home from a reception at the Turkish Ambassador's. The cabman happened to select out of the several routes through the West End one that included a narrow street where were the offices of a young Portuguese who had come to London, under the patronage of his Minister, to supply news to several journals in Portugal and in the lesser towns of Brazil. The Minister glanced up at his young friend's windows, noted the lights, stopped his cab and went up the stairs.

"Just as I left the Turkish Ambassador's," he said to the correspondent, "he got a telegram from his Government saying that the flagship Victoria and the ship of the line Camperdown, of the British Mediterranean Squadron, were in collision yesterday afternoon off the harbor of Tripoli in Syria, and that the Victoria went down with several hundred of her crew. I thought you might be able to use the news. I know the Admiralty has not given it out yet."

The young Portuguese went over his "list" in his mind and decided that he might possibly use the "beat" in his South American papers. All the newspapers in Europe had of course gone to press, and his only hope of catching even the South American journals was for a second edition. He sent his dispatch—a mere bulletin.

Thus it came to pass that on the morning after the greatest naval disaster in time of peace in history there was only one newspaper in all the world that published the fact, and that newspaper was a second-rate journal in a third-class South American town. Yet the disaster was at half-past three o'clock in the afternoon and within sight of a telegraph station.

The First News in Tripoli Since the Crusades

The Admiralty did not give out the news until late in the morning, and it was well on toward noon when the newsboys began to shout it through the streets of London, each newsboy the centre of a struggling crowd of customers. There was only the meagerest outline of the facts; nothing as to how or why; some uncertainty as to where, through the failure of several reporters to disentangle Tripoli in Asia from Tripoli in Africa; in fact, no details beyond the statement that more than three hundred lives had been lost.

We of the New York World's London Bureau assumed that the great London journals, certainly the Times, would have a full report for the next morning—early enough for us to send it on to New York, thanks to the five hours' difference of time in our favor. But we also thought that it would be a good idea to have our own special on a news event of such magnitude, of such world-interest. So we looked up Tripoli on the maps.

It proved to be a sea town about forty miles north of Beyrout and about seventy miles northwest of Damascus—a sleepy little city that was born of Tyre and Sidon when they were in their glory, and that had finished its senile activities and entered the state of suspended animation soon after Godfrey de Bouillon became King of Jerusalem. As nearly as we could get at it the only really stirring event that had happened at Tripoli since the Crusaders stormed it, and gave it to Raymond of Toulouse, in the twelfth century, was this great catastrophe at the edge of its shallow harbor. There was no British Consul, no American Consul, nobody to whom we could telegraph, offering a liberal honorarium for an account of the disaster. We knew that the British journalists must have friends among the several thousand men of those eleven great ships of the Eastern Mediterranean Squadron, to whom they would telegraph and from whom they would get the story. But we had no such resources.

Now, in America it often happens that a tip comes in over the wire of some unexpected news event at an obscure village where a newspaper is published and no newspaper correspondents live, and to which it is impossible to get a reporter in time. In those circumstances the average American night editor wires the telegraph operator at the point nearest the scene, asking him to send at once as many facts as he can gather and assuring him that he will be paid well for his trouble. Ninety-nine times out of a hundred the night editor reaps some return.

Taking Long Odds to Get the News

Why not try this plan on Tripoli? It is a telegraph station on the Turkish Government lines. There must be a telegraph operator, and he must have some intelligence and the passion for easy money.

The London correspondent was at the general offices of the Eastern Telegraph Company in the East End as soon as a cab could get him there, and was immediately in consultation with the General Manager. He listened, he smiled—politely, for he was an extremely courteous man, was the General Manager—but with the tolerant superiority of experience observing the antics of inexperienced folly.

"You would be throwing away your two shillings a word," he said. "The operator is a Turk. He does not know one word of English. You ought to see the mess he has made of every private message that has come through to-day. And, furthermore, he never heard of your paper or of New York, or even of the United States. Why, he would not even know a message had been sent him."

This was certainly common sense and depressing. To persist seemed folly.

The American correspondent hesitated and then said:

"Well, it's a small stake for a big return, a sort of ten thousand to one shot, as we say in what you call 'The States.' I'll risk it. You'll do your best to get my message through in a hurry, won't you?"

"Oh, yes," replied the General Manager, and he seemed to look a little less incredulous. He seemed to be just a bit infected with the gambler's spirit.

The correspondent wrote and scratched out and wrote again, the General Manager assisting with increasing interest. Finally he was speaking of it as "our telegram" and was not trying to conceal what might almost be called excitement. The telegram was sent, and read something like this:

"To the Telegraph Agent,
"Tripoli, Syria.

"The New York World will pay you five hundred dollars for a full account of the Victoria disaster—We hope you will send about two thousand words—Please send as soon as possible."

And so it went, under the seas, past the confines of civilization, and, after a wait of many hours, down that remote, inaccessible coast of Asia Minor, so near to Europe geographically, so near to civilization, yet for the purposes of a newspaper more distant than scores of places of the same size in China and Japan.

There was nothing to do but wait—and, of course, telephone to the friendly General Manager at intervals. That twenty-third of June—a Friday—wore on until midnight, and then the four early hours of the Saturday during which any message that might have come could have been sent to New York for publication in the Saturday morning paper. But nothing came from the "unspeakable Turk."

The London Saturday morning papers were about to appear and they would surely have all the details. The General Manager was right. The scheme was preposterous. The correspondent had wasted hope and money on a foolish telegram to "Nobody, Nowhere."

Blocked on the Very Verge of Success

It was a crestfallen group that attacked the pile of freshly printed London morning newspapers at dawn in the correspondent's chambers. Despondency soon changed to wonder, wonder to amazement. Not a single London journal, not even the all-seeing Times, had any account of the disaster. Beyond a few names of the lost, given out at the Admiralty, and long descriptions of the intense anxiety throughout the Empire, there was nothing.

A few hours later the correspondent was again in the offices of the General Manager. That official looked keenly disappointed and at the same time a little ashamed of himself.

"Nothing," he said, gloomily shaking his head. "I——" he certainly meant to say "told you so," but he stopped and finished with "fear we shall get nothing."

The correspondent drove back home and ordered the evening papers sent in as fast as their various editions might appear in the streets. He was just looking through the first installments for the story that was not there when the General Manager burst in. He had come in a cab from the far East End, but he looked as if he had run every step of the way.

"Here it is—an answer!" he said excitedly, and the correspondent was devouring a few words on a big, square, thin sheet of the Eastern Telegraph Company's paper. It read about like this:

"Prepay telegraph tolls or telegraph the money to pay—Will send account.
"Pierre."

"Let's get the money off at once," said the correspondent, seizing his hat.

"You can't," groaned the General Manager. "If you could, I think I'd have sent it myself. But we can only send to the end of our lines and the Turkish Government will not take it on. There's no way in the world of getting a cent of money to Tripoli from here except by mail."

An Anxious Second Day of Waiting

Here was a story that the whole world was waiting for and that every great newspaper in England and on the Continent had been moving heaven and earth to get. And it was just within the grasp of the American paper—when the unbusinesslike methods of a barbaric government intervened and refused to move.

"What can be done?" asked the correspondent.

"Nothing," exclaimed the General Manager, looking as if he were planning personally to wipe out the stain of "the Great Assassin" from the map of Europe.

"We'll send another telegram," said the correspondent. "We'll throw ourselves upon the mercy of friend Pierre."

And so this following was sent:

"Pierre, the Telegraph Station,
"Tripoli, Syria.

"Impossible telegraph money from here—You will put us under greatest obligations if you get money there—Telegraph us amount paid out—We will mail draft at once—Many thanks for courtesy—Your dispatch sent at once will probably be first account Victoria disaster published anywhere."

"That man is no Turk," said the correspondent. "He seems to understand American newspaper methods for all his French name."

Another day of waiting. It was now late in the afternoon of Saturday. No news in the afternoon papers. No news from Pierre all that night. No news in the Sunday morning papers. No news from Pierre Sunday morning, Sunday afternoon, Sunday evening, Sunday midnight, the early hours of Monday morning. Again the anxious scanning of the London Monday morning newspapers and again relief and amazement because there was no news of the disaster, only more and angrier remonstrance that the public had been kept in suspense for four days when the officers of the fleet had access to a wire and must, as a matter of course, have received messages from and sent messages to the Admiralty office in London.

At eleven o'clock on that Monday morning the correspondent was at breakfast over a particularly trying cup of the proverbially vile English coffee. In rushed a messenger from the Eastern Telegraph Company. It was the first sheets of the long-expected "special"—a half dozen sentences describing the appearance of the British fleet as it began to manœuvre just off the harbor. The mysterious correspondent at Tripoli was "beginning at the beginning"—an unfailing sign of a good story.

Within ten minutes came another messenger, and so on at intervals of about ten minutes, until the correspondent had before him a pile of loosely written sheets containing a complete, logical and admirably clear account of what had happened. His story went on to tell:

The Admirable Story from "the Unknown"

How Vice-Admiral Sir George Tryon, commanding the eleven warships that were advancing in double file, had given, from the flagship Victoria, the signal to turn inward so as to make a sort of "right about face" movement; how Admiral Markham had signaled from the Camperdown that the movement was impossible in such close quarters; how Admiral Tryon had merely repeated his order; how the Victoria and Camperdown, leading the two files, had turned each toward the other.

The bow of the Camperdown crashed into the side of the Victoria and the Camperdown drew back. The Victoria, with a great hole in her side, staggered, then started ahead at full speed through the smooth waters for the shore. Admiral Tryon signaled that he needed no assistance. Presently the Victoria, having got quite a distance inshore from the rest of the fleet, plunged forward and went down bow first like a "sounding" whale. There was a vortex at the bottom of which whirled the great blades of the screws. Into this maelstrom, down upon those frightful, swift-revolving knives, were drawn several hundred British sailors, marines and officers. They were torn into pieces, the sea was reddened all around and strewn with arms, legs, heads, trunks. Then the engines, far down beneath the surface, burst, and scores of those still alive were scalded to death—and the sea smoothed out and began to laugh in the superb tropical sunlight of that summer afternoon.

A few survivors were picked up. Twenty-two officers and three hundred and thirty-six men had perished.

It was a wonderful story of an insane commander, of valor and coolness and discipline triumphant, of tragic death. And "the unknown" at the Tripoli telegraph station had told it well.

The special was written in admirable English sentences so far as form went, but the spelling, the distortions of words and phrases, the breakdown of sense here and there showed that an operator who knew nothing of English had sent it. We translated it into connected English and cabled it on to New York, sending with it a technical explanation of the manœuvring by William Laird Clowes, the famous English naval expert.

It reached New York at half-past seven o'clock (New York time) in the evening of Monday, June 26. Soon came a cablegram from the Managing Editor:

"Eight this evening your special on streets in extra—Great beat—Congratulations—Who's Pierre?"

It was not telegraphed back to London by the New York correspondents of the English journals in time for their Tuesday morning editions. So, while England and Europe

The Kidnaping of President Lincoln

BY

Joel Chandler Harris

Next week's SATURDAY EVENING POST will contain the opening chapters of a three-part serial by Joel Chandler Harris.

The bold attempt made by two daring Southerners to take Mr. Lincoln prisoner and convey him secretly to Richmond is, at once, one of the most interesting and one of the least-known episodes of the Civil War.

Mr. Harris has told the story with rare charm and skill, and it is not too much to say that he has made the best pen picture of President Lincoln's domestic life at the White House and his relations with Secretary Stanton that has yet been given.

A Commercial Education Without Cost

Business knowledge is the great underlying power that pushes a young man on to success, whatever his occupation may be. It makes him solid, substantial and practical. Backed up by energy and perseverance, advance in business life is certain. It is possible by years of hard work and experience to acquire a business education, but an easier, surer and more thorough plan is to obtain it in a short time in a well-equipped business college.

The POST has made arrangements with one hundred of the best commercial colleges in the country, covering almost every section, in any of which a business education may be secured by any of the POST readers absolutely without cost; all that is necessary is a little work for the magazine in leisure hours. A full commercial course, or a special course in stenography and typewriting, can be obtained in this way, while for those living in small towns, remote from places where the selected colleges are located, a special course by mail in the latter branches has been arranged.

There is nothing competitive in the plan—a complete commercial course, or, for that matter, a musical education or a university course in any one of eight hundred colleges and schools throughout the United States, may be secured in return for pleasant work easily performed.

No such opportunity has ever been offered to young people. Send a line to The Post Educational Bureau for full details.

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

were still waiting, the United States knew the whole terrible story of Admiral Tryon's insane order and its appalling consequences.

The American paper published the story on the morning of June 27 in its regular editions. Then it was cabled back to London, and on the morning of June 28—six days after that great disaster—the London Times and the London Telegraph printed the first story of the Victoria disaster with full credit to the American newspaper.

The Identity of the Unknown Correspondent

The London afternoon dailies promptly tried to discredit the "American special." It was clearly impossible, they pointed out, that an American newspaper should get a detailed account of the disaster. Was it not a disaster to a British ship? Did it not occur three thousand miles nearer England than America? Therefore, could anything be clearer than that the alleged "special" was a "fake"? A visit to each of these logical editors and an exhibition of the telegram from Tripoli before his amazed and envious eyes produced courteous retractions in later editions, and caused the Times and the Telegraph to assert the authenticity of the news the next morning.

It was not until the morning of July 1 that any English newspaper had a "special" of its own, giving an account of the disaster. That first English "special" came from Malta the day the Eastern Mediterranean Squadron arrived there. It simply repeated the story with less detail. So the "special" sent by the correspondent at Tripoli remains to this day the most complete and accurate newspaper account of the Victoria disaster ever published.

Who was "Pierre"?

That is the most curious part of the story. Let him tell it in his own words in the following letter received by the correspondent about a week after the "beat":

"TRIPOLI, SYRIA, June 26.

"Dear Sir:—Tripoli is an obscure town with not the least enterprise. I am the only American here now and the only foreigner who speaks English. I know of only five natives who speak English, and that with difficulty.

"I happened to be in the telegraph office when your telegram came. The agent, a Turk, whose name is in French Pierre, and who can't speak a word of English—only French and Arabic—instead of throwing it away, gave it to me to translate for him. When I did so he said:

"'I don't know about this newspaper. Do you?'

"I told him I had good reason to know it, for I had been a subscriber for the past four years, 'and you are sure of your money.' But he would not do anything about it. I saw that if you got anything I must do it.

"The operators never work after sunset, and only by the Governor's orders do they work until ten at night during the stay of the English fleet. When I showed the article they said:

"'To-morrow will do.'

"I replied: 'Must, at once.'

"'But we must go to the city'—two miles away inland from the port. So it was after ten at night before I could get a second operator—a new hand, in fact, a learner—to go with me. Then we had to wait thirty-five minutes for a tram car, then another thirty-five minutes to get to the office, then half an hour for the operator to smoke a cigar and get Beyrout.

"Then I had to spell every word, for the boy who sent my story did not know English. If the copy was mixed or anything was wrong you must blame the operator. I tried my very best to get it off in time and in right order.

"I had to borrow the cash necessary to pay for so big a telegram from an old merchant I know in the town. And mighty hard work I had getting it, when he found out what I wanted it for. He thought the hot sun had turned my brain.

"This is the first time I ever tried my hand at reporting, and may the good Lord deliver me from any such work again—especially in Turkey. I am the American doctor here and have a large practice.

"Several requests came for items from the London papers, but I bought them off. So you had the only full account that left the telegraph office. The official report for the Admiralty was sent by mail Saturday night.

"I got the story of the accident from a midshipman who was on the bridge with the Rear-Admiral (Markham, of the Camperdown) at the time the fatal order to turn was given. This was only an hour after the accident. All he told me has been confirmed by many eyewitnesses. I myself was standing watching the manœuvres and saw the Victoria disappear. IRA HARRIS, M. D."

A Sequence of Coincidence to Stagger Belief

Here is a series of coincidences that staggers imagination. A telegram is sent anonymously into Asia Minor. It reaches a Turk who does not understand its language, and would not understand its purport even if he could translate it. A man who knows English just happens to drop into the telegraph office.

"To-morrow will do." I replied: "Must, at once."

The man happens to be not only English-speaking but an American. He reads the telegram. He happens to be a subscriber to the very American newspaper that sent it. He is interested, and his American "stick-to-itiveness" is aroused by sundry exasperating and fatiguing and disheartening obstacles. He gets together the very considerable cash needed—borrows it, if you please—and all in order that his newspaper published in his native land may "beat the world" on a great news event.

The credit for the beat in this instance belongs to that enthusiastic and enterprising doctor, Ira Harris. Any credit there may be in giving him the opportunity to distinguish himself lies in the extraordinary, foolhardy, preposterous even, application of a very commonplace American device for getting news from inaccessible American villages.

It is not surprising that the General Manager of the Eastern Telegraph Company should have been amused at the "crazy American." Only sheer luck can account for the incredible series of coincidences by which success attended the attempt to apply such a simple plan to such a great matter and in such impossible circumstances. What could be more hopeless than for an American in London to ask by cable across Europe and into Asia a troublesome and expensive favor of a Turk dozing in sloth and ignorance in a land where all the Occident is regarded as a kennel of indistinguishable "infidel dogs"?

Literary Folk as they Come and Go

Miss Harraden's Literary Training

While recently visiting a Chicago friend, Miss Beatrice Harraden, the brilliant English novelist, gave this account of her first experience as an author:

"From the start my aim was high. When only seventeen I made my first serious literary attempt. It was a short story called The Voice of the Violin, and I summoned the bravery to send it to Blackwood's Magazine, wherein George Eliot and many other great British authors had made their fame. Oh, how eagerly did I watch the post for something from the celebrated editorial office which should make known the fate of my first effort! Finally the token came. The bulky envelope told me the whole story of rejection and disappointment. With the impulsiveness of an irritated schoolgirl, I threw the packet unopened into my trunk and turned my thoughts in other directions. Weeks later, in obedience to another impulse of the moment, I went to my chamber, took the envelope from the trunk and tore it open. There was the ill-fated story, to be sure, but with something which was destined to exercise a strong influence upon the bent of my life. It was a long and kind autograph letter from William Blackwood himself, in which he said that, though the first little story could not be given place in the pages of the magazine, he saw in it the promise of things to come so excellent that he felt convinced that experience would make me a real Blackwood's writer. This compliment was not lost on me, for I was familiar with the rich literary traditions of the Blackwood's house. The letter also invited me to continue sending stories until acceptance should finally be the reward of perseverance, and assured me that Mr. Blackwood would give me the benefit of personal criticism.

"That first story was sent to Belgravia and accepted; but my ambition was to get something into Blackwood's. Time after time I sent to the famous Edinburgh house the best work of which I was capable—only to receive it back again with a generously painstaking letter pointing out its defects and giving definite advice for future efforts.

"One day I posted an unpretending sketch called The Umbrella Mender, thinking it would return to me in due season as my other efforts had done. Instead, I received a characteristic note from Mr. Blackwood telling me, in happy terms, that I had fairly won a place in the pages of Blackwood's Magazine. After that I had fair sailing until I offered Ships That Pass in the Night. Mr. Blackwood at last gave it as his opinion that the book would not sell. This forced me to look elsewhere for a publisher who would take it. The sale was very large. Not in the least, however, did this experience shake my sense of loyalty to Mr. Blackwood, and I gave him my next story as readily as if there had been no such episode."

Beatrice Harraden confesses herself a "fiery British patriot," and just before sailing for England, a few weeks since, she declared: "I'm eager to get back so that I can go down to the docks and welcome the victorious soldier boys as they come home from fighting the Boers. Why, I haven't had so much as a chance for one good, rousing, patriotic cheer. But I'll make up for lost time when I get back to the dear old town where the air is full of just that sort of thing."

Miss Harraden has probably the shortest working day of any writer who labors systematically. She permits herself to work but ninety minutes a day. In this brief time, however, she accomplishes a marvelous amount of work. When asked if she did not do any mental work outside of her appointed hour-and-a-half of labor she answered: "Unconsciously, perhaps; but not to focus anything. During all the remainder of the time I try to be diligently idle so far as literary thought is concerned." Of her own novels, Miss Harraden is said to regard The Fowler as a much stronger piece of work than Ships That Pass in the Night.

Clement Shorter's Misadventure

Mr. Clement Shorter is in many ways the best-known editor in England. Not only is he known by every literary person in the kingdom, but the public knows his name, and it was no small part of the advertisement of the new weekly illustrated paper, the Sphere, that he was to be its editor. Mr. Shorter used to edit the Illustrated London News, the Sketch and a few other papers for Sir William Ingram. And when Mr. Shorter left and announced a paper of his own, Sir William, in his excitement and anger, announced a rival to be called the Spear and brought it out three days before the Sphere.

Mr. Shorter has had all kinds of experience with contributors. Once he asked a well-known "younger poet" for some verses, and when they had been printed sent the author a check for five guineas, which, as rates go for the payment for "younger" poetry, was liberal. But the next day the poet called and, when he was admitted to the editor's room, announced that fifty pounds was the least he could possibly accept, and that that would be niggardly payment. Mr. Shorter, gasping with astonishment, started to protest, when the excited poet produced a revolver and, flourishing it at his editor, ordered the latter to write out a check at once.

There are several versions of the ending of this episode, the most popular being that the check was signed. At any rate it was never cashed, for next day the poet was in bed with a dangerous fever. When he recovered he had no memory of his buccaneering expedition and thought five guineas ample pay.

Will N. Harben—Mind-Reader

Will N. Harben is rather serious in disposition, but he cannot resist the temptation to play an occasional practical joke. A few years ago he and a literary friend had taken chambers in London near the British Museum. One day this friend came home with a tired look on his face and said that he had been frightfully bored for half a day by a stranger from Chicago, who insisted upon telling him all about his success in inventing and selling in America and England a certain wall-paper hanger. The stranger was described as freckled-faced and short, and possessing a squeaking voice.

A few days after this, while looking at the pictures in the South Kensington Museum, Mr. Harben was accosted by a man who so thoroughly fitted the description of the loquacious bore that he knew at once that he had met the same man.

Mr. Harben determined that he would not submit to the man's familiarity, and when asked if he were an American, he answered frigidly that he was.

"What are you doin' over here?"

"What am I doing?" asked Harben, trying to summon up some cutting reply. "Really, my business is such a peculiar one that I never speak of it to any one."

"Oh, come off," laughed the Chicagoan; "what is it?"

Harben stared at the red face for a moment and then said, "I'm a mind-reader."

The stranger laughed boisterously. "I don't believe in such rot."

"Oh, you don't?" remarked Harben. "Well, I could convince you in a minute if I wished to. I could tell where you are from, what your business was in America, and what you are doing over here."

The stranger laughed again. "I'd like to see you do it," he said.

"Well," continued the author, "you are from Chicago; you invented a wall-paper hanger and made a lot of money out of it in America; you are introducing your invention here and have started out well, but my impression is that you will lose all your fortune here in England."

The stranger paled and his eyes were starting from his head. "How did you know that?"

"I'm a mind-reader," said the joker.

WHAT to READ

A Yale Story*

Stories of American college life have multiplied during the decade passed. Yale, Harvard, Princeton and several of the women's colleges have been described with more or less skill and fidelity. The latest contribution to this sort of fiction—and how fascinating it can be let memories of Tom Brown rise up to testify—is a novel called Boys and Men, by Richard Holbrook, a Yalesian of the class of '93, we believe, and now an instructor in the Romance department of the famous old New Haven institution.

Mr. Holbrook has written a decidedly interesting book. It is made up of a series of sketches and can hardly be styled an organic piece of fiction; he takes a typical group of fellows on their entrance into college life and carries them through to graduation. He shows them first as care-free boys, then as men whom four years of experience in this miniature world have broadened and deepened. The primary aim being to display Yale—to give a lively picture of the place and its inhabitants—the lack of close-knit narrative is hardly to be imputed as a fault; even an occasional repetition can be pardoned. The important questions are: is the author true to the facts, and is his account an entertaining one? I think the answer to both queries is, yes.

Mr. Holbrook knows his Yale and shows it to the reader in many graphic scenes. We are permitted to be present at a hazing party and at an examination where an attempt at cheating is made; we witness a big football game, and hear the men of the team or crew talk at the training-table; we sit on the sacred fence beneath the elms and watch the "tapping" of the fortunate elect of the senior societies; we look on at the dancing at the Junior Promenade, or behold from an observation car at New London the old-time rivals strain at the oars. Meanwhile we get a sense of the Yale spirit—a splendid esprit de corps, a democratic belief in personal worth and achievement.

Mr. Holbrook, too, has happily caught the student dialect; his dialogue is capital. The boys talk in a crisp, racy, highly colored manner that is at once natural and enjoyable. His student types are also sufficiently amusing. The friendship that develops between the sturdy Arizonian, Tarbell, and Jack Eldredge, son of the millionaire railroad man, is effective and becomes the strongest motive of the story; both are popular athletes and both fall in love with the same girl. The author has not seen fit to dispense with the most appealing of all fictional situations. The trouble that arises from this complication is well managed and lends an agreeable touch of romance to the closing chapters. The only criticism to be passed on it is that this introduction of the eternal feminine carries the tale somewhat outside of college limits; but few, I fancy, will fault it for that reason. Yale graduate and undergraduate will appreciate a volume whose admirers, however, need by no means be confined to the Sons of Eli. —Richard Burton.

With Sword and Crucifix†

From the title and earlier chapters of Mr. Van Zile's romance one hopes to find a narrative of that picturesque New-World crusade, whose quest was a mighty river, for the honor of France and Mother Church. But the author uses this historic pilgrimage merely as a background; and instead of the knightly figure of the Sieur de la Salle, he chooses a French outlaw for his hero, Count de Sancerre, exiled from the Court of Louis le Grand for having killed his rival in a duel. "L'éternelle femme" in this case being a Spanish beauty. Banished from Versailles, De Sancerre joins La Salle, and, after sharing many adventures with his intrepid band, is finally left as hostage with a tribe of fire-worshipers, while the great captain goes on to teach the mouth of the Mississippi to speak the name of France—and in so going passes out of the story. De Sancerre is compensated for his enforced sojourn in the City of the Sun when he discovers his lost love imprisoned there in an adobe temple, worshiped as the Spirit Coyocup.

This amazing situation is the last in a series of startling incidents due to her father's determination to carry salvation—in exchange for gold—to the heathen of New Spain. The old Don's vessel is wrecked almost within sight of his long-sought El Dorado, every soul on board perishing save the fair heroine and the villain—whose name, very appropriately, is Don Juan. She is captured by the natives who believe her to be a messenger from their deity, the Sun God, and the villain—but that is another story. The gallant Count naturally objects to his own particular goddess receiving the adoration of any one except himself, and especially of a horde of fanatical savages; yet he learns by sad experience that the divinity which doth hedge an idol may prove an impregnable barrier to a supposed unbeliever. Happily there is one genuine sceptic in the ranks of worshipers, the old crone Noco, who, unawed by the wrath of the Sun God, releases his cherished messenger and speeds her and her lover on their way to the sea and safety.

The author of this melodramatic but harmless tale, and others of his cult who are responsible for that ubiquitous figure in modern fiction, the exiled courtier, should pause to meditate on the ethics of clothes before they plunge their hero into the trackless wastes of a virgin forest clad in silks and laces. It would be no more incongruous were Frederic Remington to portray a leader of Manhattan cotillons, attired in evening clothes and top hat, in the act of mounting an Arizona bucking bronco.

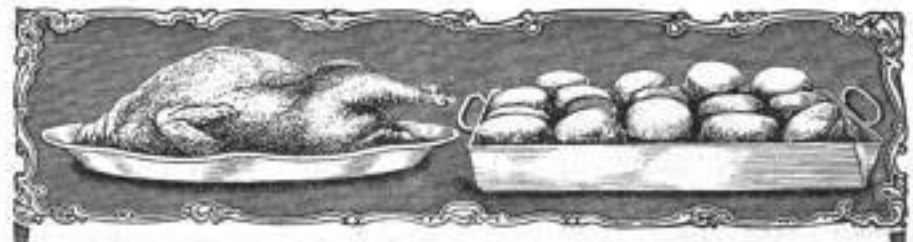
Glimpses of New Books



Readers who followed Mr. and Mrs. March in Their Wedding Journey will be glad to know that Mr. Howell's account of Their Silver Wedding Journey has been put out in a popular edition. Harper & Brothers.

Katherine de Forrest attempts to do for the stranger in Paris what the coach does for the student who, with the consciousness of a long list of lectures unattended and books not read, faces the coming examinations—to crowd into his head a spiral of knowledge which, upon the proper occasion, shall expand outward to its complete length. No one, of course, can tell whether Paris As It Is is "sure enough the real thing," as the late Mr. William Baxter would have elegantly phrased it, until he tries it for himself, but he is likely to have a much better time trying with such an intimate companion than with the eminently respectable Baedeker. Doubleday, Page & Co.

Scott thought that the richest fields in history, and the most picturesque, were those that lay between the borders of civilization and barbarism. Mr. Stanley Weyman in Under the Red Robe scored a notable success in just such territory, and now he offers Sophia, a romance of the England of Queen Anne. If the times of Queen Anne seem passive compared to those of Henry the Fourth, the love affairs of the heroine offer an agreeable contrast. Sophia, from a harassing net of intrigue, shakes herself free to stand by the side of the man she loves, a ready and a noble nature. Longmans, Green & Co.

We want to add fifty thousand names to the subscription list of PETS AND ANIMALS during the next six months. In order to secure the necessary co-operation, we will pay to agents who will assist us the enormous sum of ten thousand dollars. Payment will be made in cash or merchandise, at agent's option.

While we will award special prizes of great value, consisting of pianos, bicycles, pleasure trips, cameras, typewriters, etc., etc., as well as of cash, to those who raise the largest clubs, our plan is such that EVERY person who acts as agent for us will be liberally paid, in amount proportionate to the number of subscribers sent in.

All Our Agents Get Something. We Want Helpers from Every Walk of Life

PETS AND ANIMALS is the only publication of its kind, and subscriptions for it are easily obtained. In every home there are persons deeply interested in the objects of our journal. A paper devoted to the needs of our dumb friends has been desired for many years. There is no more popular journal published, and at the low subscription price—50 cents a year—club raising for it is an easy task.

School teachers and their pupils, preachers, farmers, clerks, postmasters, everybody can make good money working on our proposition during the summer months. Remember, we propose to pay $10,000 to agents and club raisers for fifty thousand yearly subscriptions. Send for full particulars; they will be furnished free. Address

Rock the Baby or Yourself in the

WAYNE LAWN and VERANDA SWING

An outdoor delight in summer on lawn or porch—an indoor pleasure all the year 'round in attic, playroom or nursery. Appreciated alike by grown-ups and little ones.

Safe, restful, strongly made, noiseless, adjustable to any reclining or upright positions. Supersedes the hammock. Can be occupied and operated by one to four persons. Gives the same motion as a ten-foot swing, yet it is only 4⅞ feet high, 7 feet long and 3½ feet wide. Takes no more room than a couch. Will sustain a ton weight. The pressure of the foot gives the motion. As easily operated as a rocking-chair. Price from $10.00 up, according to finish.

Free booklet, with descriptions and prices, upon request

LOUIS RASTETTER & SON, Ft. Wayne, Ind.

Only Automatic Endless Spring Reel

From which it is possible to withdraw line after it is wound up—no "throw off" to forget. Not an open line spool—no chance for line to jump. In winding, simply turn the drum. No "nickel alarm clock key" to catch line or fingers. The main spring will "unhook" by releasing ratchet, so that reel can "run down" without danger of breaking. Accomplishes everything that any other reel can, and has advantages that no other reel possesses. To operate, tie your line on and pull it out as usual. When you wish to retrieve the line, press the lever. You can adjust the "pull" of the reel by turning the main spring down. No fish can give it the slip, and when you once have used a "Martin" you will have no other.

Made in four sizes, with patent endless spring winding device. Material: Aluminum with German Silver Trimmings. Use the "MARTIN" on your pet rod—it relieves all strain, and saves its cost in one season. If your dealer cannot supply you with the "Martin" (refuse all others), write us for descriptive circular and special prices.

THE LIGHT THAT NEVER FAILS

"THE ANGLE LAMP"

Will rob the summer of one of its most dangerous features—the almost unbearable heat of ordinary illumination. It is so pleasant and cool that many summer homes are equipped with it to the exclusion of every other method. Furthermore, it never smokes, smells or gets out of order; is lighted and extinguished as easily as you; may be filled while lighted and without being moved, and burns for about eighteen cents a month. Its unique feature is

"NO-UNDER-SHADOW"

Allows all its beautiful, brilliant light to fall directly downward while the lamp is hung high in the room. Thousands are in use in homes, stores, offices, halls, churches, summer residences, etc., and it is truly the ideal light. Our Catalogue K shows all styles from $1.00 up. Sent on request.

"Advantages of a College Education"

wasn't sure; in fact, he betted that he was mistaken and made the stakes higher as each flight was ascended. When Harrison burst in he raised his head and cried, "Why, hello, Skin!" He was always polite to callers.

"What's the matter with you?" said Skinny, opening the blinds and the window and letting in some good, fresh, campus air. He came back to the bed again. "Was that it?"

Then he lifted Elliot's head and pulled out the pillows, putting them back as gently as he could. "Perhaps you want your head higher." He did not wait for an answer, but picked up a pair of muddy shoes and a coat and placed them carefully under the pillow, saying, "How does that grab you?" Harrison had a deep, hearty voice, and he filled the room with it. His cheeks were fresh and rosy, and he stepped across the floor as though it were fun to walk and be alive.

He brought a basin of water to the trunk. "Your mug's dirty," he explained, and rolled up the sleeves of Elliot's pajamas. "Don't look frightened, Bob; it isn't cold enough to hurt. This is the way my pretty nurse did me when I was in the Presbyterian Hospital." He began sponging Elliot's hot brow and burning eyelids and feverish neck with luxuriously cold water. "Lord, but your hands feel dry! You look as though you'd been pulled through a knothole. Honestly, Bob, you're horribly done-up looking." Young men are so devoid of tact.

Harrison's skinniness consisted of 206 pounds in his gymnasium suit, some of which was fat. His hands were large and firm and strong, and his touch was as tender and supple as a barber's.

Elliot's eyes were half closed, and he did everything that Harrison told him to do. He soaked his hands in the basin and paddled like a baby while Harrison brushed his hair with the part on the wrong side. "Now you look more nearly decent," he said, adding, "and you've been up here all this time alone, Sour Ball? I know you weren't lonely, though I should have been, but it wasn't right not to let some of us know. Stop fussing with those covers. I'll put the window up before I go. Fresh air'll do you good."

The Great Tub of Self-Indulgence then went into the other room, brought back a novel and an armchair and, putting his feet upon the foot of the bed, began to read aloud, while David Haskell stood over at the corner of Reunion, swearing at all engagement breakers.

"Much obliged to you, Skinny," said Elliot; "but you'd better not stay here."

"Shut up and go to sleep; sick people always sleep, don't you know that?"

"But there's no sense in your loafing indoors on a day like this."

"Do I bother you?" Skinny went on reading and the sick man closed his eyes.

At dinner-time Harrison stopped reading and tiptoed out, and went whistling down to the club, where he told the rest what the Sour Ball had been up to.

After dinner those who had no pressing engagements tramped up to the top floor of Witherspoon. Elliot heard their voices as soon as the entry door slammed downstairs, and arose up in bed to listen and make sure, but he pretended to be asleep when they all came bounding in, the noisy, healthy, pipe-smoking crowd, which he hated. "Well, Sour Ball! Hello, Bob! How are you by this time? What can I do for you?" they said.

The first to enter the room impolitely took the one available chair. Downing, the man who used platitudes so exasperatingly to Elliot, sat down on the bed, upon Elliot's foot, who said nothing. The Glee Club man and the Princetonian editor, both thoroughly despicable, planted themselves in the window-seats, putting their muddy feet on the cushions. Some of the rest of the odious gang perched on trunks, brushing Elliot's things off upon the floor. Others leaned against the wall and furniture. They made seven in all. Elliot counted them. He looked at each in turn covertly. He followed them when they moved about the room. Rankin came in later. He was a noisy man, and he dragged his feet along the hallway and kicked open the door, singing out in a cheerful tone, "How's the corpse? How's the corpse?" and was silenced for it by the gang. "What do you think this man's made of?" said Harrison. "You ass!"

Rankin begged Elliot's pardon. Elliot said it didn't matter. "You look like the mischief, Bob," said Rankin, standing before the bed, hands in pockets.

Skinny Harrison still assumed control of the invalid because he had discovered him, and because he was going to be a doctor like his father in a few years. He looked very thoughtful and responsible, and opened the window when the smoke became so dense he couldn't see across the room.

"You think," said one of those by the window, closing it, "that because you're going to study medicine you know all about this, don't you?"

Harrison said that sick people always liked lots of air. This started a discussion about fresh air and illness in which every one joined except Elliot, who was not consulted. After this they fell to talking about the ordinary topics of the college world, which continued until twelve o'clock, when Harrison suddenly remembered his future profession, and sent them all home.

Then, after fixing Elliot for the night, he said, "Yell if you want anything," and stretched out upon the divan in the study. Elliot didn't yell or say anything.

The next day some of them dropped in before breakfast, and they took turns staying with him all day. Sometimes they read to him, sometimes they talked, at times they cleaned pipes, at times they did nothing. Elliot was doing a lot of thinking.

Mason, sarcastic little Mason, whom Elliot especially despised, arranged to spend the next night with him, perhaps because they were distant cousins.

"Now, go to your own room," said Elliot, after Mason had fixed things, "and go to bed."

"Shut up and go to thunder," said Mason, going into the study and turning up the light.

At three o'clock the light was still burning. Elliot thought he heard the snip of a page being turned over, but he was not certain, so he moved around in bed until he made the springs sound. Something darkened the doorway. He shut his eyes again. The shadow receded. He heard a yawn and the sound of a man's arms dropped to his side.

At a little before daylight Mason heard Elliot say in the clear tone of one who has been awake: "Would you mind bringing me my bulldog brier? You'll find it on the mantelpiece."

Mason brought it in, saying: "This is a good sign, but it strikes me as an odd time to smoke."

"Will you fill it, please?"

"There you are," said Mason, reaching for a match.

Elliot looked up at the bright eyes and the curling mouth while Mason held the match, then looked away again. He started to say something, then picked up a book near by and with the back of it leveled the ashes in his pipe. "Mase," he said, "you fellows are —puff-puff—awful good—puff-puff—it's out; give me another match, please. Thank you. What was I saying?—oh, yes, I was going to say—oh, yes, I just wanted to tell you that I am entirely cured now."

"Huh," said Mason; "didn't think it was anything serious."

"You don't know," said Elliot, taking out his pipe and looking at it. "You don't know what I'm talking about, Mase."

"Better go to sleep," said Mason, starting back toward the study; "glad you're all right, anyway."

"I'm talking about the advantages of a college education. I have discovered—"

But Mason shut the door, and Elliot fell sound asleep. Fellows like Elliot go through life making discoveries.

The Wren's Breach of Custom

MR. LE GALLIENNE writes of Nature as a lover, but his poetic fancy does not disguise from us that he was bred in cities. In his chapter on what Nature brings to beauty the graves of the little dead he writes:

"The wren will sometimes bring her sky-blue eggs for a gift . . ."

Perhaps a wren may be permitted to do this sort of thing in a "tragic fairy tale"; in every-day life she would have to purchase them from a commercially minded hedge-sparrow, for her own eggs are a pearly white with reddish brown spots.

In any memorial concerning Mr. Dick it is impossible to keep out some mention of Mr. Richard Le Gallienne's hair. Two literary friends of his were recently speaking of the disproportionate amount of adverse criticism he occasionally received. One said: "His work is often excellent; he is slated because of the length of his hair. And it's that helped him at first."

"Ah," said the other, "it began as a boomerang and ended as a boomerang."

I

ON THE first day of April, 1863, young Francis Bethune, of Georgia, sat in the reading-room of the most popular hotel in the capital of the Confederacy the picture of gloom and dejection. The frown on his swarthy face—his features had been tanned by exposure to sun and weather—was deepened by the disordered condition of his black hair, through which, in perplexity or abstraction, he had clawed his fingers in all directions. Though Bethune was strikingly handsome when at his best, the casual passer-by would hardly have guessed it, unless, indeed, the young man's singularly brilliant eyes had invited a close examination.

As he sat there, dejected and unhappy, he could see the Southern leaders passing to and fro before him—Robert Toombs, impetuous and imperious; Ben Hill, impressive and genial; Alexander Stephens, pallid and frail, but with the fires of vitality burning in his eyes. These men were Georgians, and young Bethune knew that the mention of the name of his grandfather to any one of them would be sufficient to enlist his interest; but he knew, also, that the most powerful of them all could render him no assistance in his present difficulty.

He had begun a letter to his grandfather, but had torn it to shreds before half a sheet was finished. The truth is, the young fellow knew that his troubles were of his own making, and he felt that he must depend upon himself. As is the case with many young men, he had been somewhat spoiled in the bringing up. When he was small no one was allowed to thwart him or to stand in the way of his will, save on those rare occasions when his grandfather, losing all patience, gave him over to a severe trouncing. Thus the spirit of independence which he had developed early was overlaid with perverseness. He had entered the Confederate service as a Lieutenant when twenty-one years old, had been mentioned in the reports for gallantry on the field, and later had been elected Captain of his company.

Then, as might have been expected, he shortly found himself at cross-purposes with no less a person than his Colonel, and immediately proceeded to inform that officer what he thought of him in general and in particular. He was saved from the worst results of his insubordination by the fact that the Colonel knew Bethune's grandfather, Meriwether Clopton, and was very fond of him. Instead of organizing a court martial the Colonel allowed the young man to resign.

It was a seasonable experience, and a sobering one. Francis Bethune had a great many fine qualities to sustain him, and he fell back on these instead of giving way to despair. But it was a trying time for the young man. His vanity took wings, and with it nearly all his youthful folly. Yet it was not his native strength that saved him at last, but the thought of two women and a girl. One of these was Sarah Clopton, his aunt, who had been the only mother he had ever known; another was Miss Puella Gillum, a little old maid; and the girl was Nan Dorrington. He had good reason to think of the two women. His aunt had received him in her arms a few weeks after his father and mother had perished in an epidemic in one of the cities of the South Atlantic coast, and had nourished him from his infancy with an affection as absolute as a mother could entertain for her child. The little old maid, Miss Puella Gillum, was not old enough to be ugly and withered; indeed, young Bethune thought she was very beautiful. When he was a boy and after he was far in his teens he used to call on Miss Puella at least twice a week. Before he was twelve, he made these visits mainly to get a cup of Miss Puella's tea and a couple of her flaky biscuit, as white as snow; but when he grew older he went for the sake of spending an hour with Miss Puella, and he always came away stronger and with a firmer purpose to do his duty in whatever shape it came to him.

Yes—there were good reasons why he should think of these women, each so different from the other, and both with such high and noble views of life. But why he should think of Nan Dorrington, that awful hoyden, with a feeling of friendliness, he could not explain. Why should he ask himself what Nan Dorrington would think and say when she heard of his latest performance on the wide stage of folly? He had been expelled from college, and he had good reason for knowing what Nan thought of that, though she was but twelve years old at the time. Now he was practically expelled from the Army, and what would Miss Spindleshanks think of that?

Spindleshanks! He had good reason to remember the name, and to remember Nan, too. He had returned from college, wearing the uniform of a cadet—he was nearly eighteen then—and, as he strutted along through the one street in the small village of Harmony Grove, trying to maintain a bold front, in spite of his inward misery, he heard some of the native humorists laughing uproariously. He was crossing toward the old tavern, and, casting an eye behind him, he beheld Nan Dorrington marching a few paces in his rear, carrying a small stick as a gun. She had caught the young gentleman's swagger to a T, and the whole town appeared to be enjoying the spectacle. He turned suddenly, his face as red as the wattles of a turkey-cock. His anger strangled him and he stood speechless for ten seconds or more.

"Thank you, Miss Spindleshanks!" he cried in a loud voice.

"You're welcome, Blackleg!" Nan replied as loudly, and with that she whacked him over the head with the small stick she carried, and his military cap rolled in the dust.

It was all done like snapping your fingers, and the blow was so sudden and unexpected that Bethune could only stare at the child. His countenance showed anger, but it also betrayed grief and dismay, and as he stood there Nan remembered him for many a long day with bitter sorrow. Her face was very white, and not with anger, as Bethune turned on his heel and went his way.

For many weeks, yes, long months, Francis Bethune hated Nan, and Nan hated him just as heartily, not because he had called her "Spindleshanks," though that term was all the more dreadful on account of its truth, but because (as she explained to herself) he had made her forget that she was a lady.

But Bethune felt, on this April day, as he sat crumpled up in his chair, that everything like hate, or envy, or vainglory had gone clean out of his mind. He thought about Nan as she really was, and as his aunt had described her in letters—a girl of wonderful beauty, living in a world of romance all her own, and yet remarkably practical, too—generous, sensitive and tender-hearted—a womanly nature pitched in a high key in which not a false note could be discerned. All this might be so, as his aunt had assured him it was, but still it did not explain why, in his extremity, his mind had turned to Nan Dorrington.

However—— He was about to pursue some argument or other connected with the subject when his attention was attracted by voices behind him. Apparently two men were holding a sort of half-confidential conversation. They were not whispering, but their voices were pitched in a low key.

Bethune sat with his eyes closed. He had not heard the men come in, and he could not remember whether they were sitting in the room when he arrived or not. Indeed, he was too miserable to try to remember. But what he heard arrested his attention and held it.

"A pass, you say—a pass through the Yankee lines?" The voice of the speaker was charged with astonishment.

"Yes, sir," replied the other; "that's what I said: a pass through the Yankee lines. More than that, it's signed by Old Abe himself."

"Whew!" whistled the first speaker. "Doesn't that seem like treason's brewing on this side? If there's somebody down here thick enough with Old Abe to be carrying on a correspondence, don't you think he ought to be looked after? The favors can't be all on one side, you know."

"Ho, ho, ho! he, he, he!" chuckled the other. He was immensely tickled. "Why, when it comes to affairs of state and matters of that kind, you are not knee-high to a duck. It's like the etiquette of the Code," he went on, his voice becoming more formal. "The same courtesy that exists between strangers must be maintained between enemies about to engage under the Code. And it is so with this bigger duel we see going on before our eyes. Why, there's—but I can't talk; my mouth is closed; I've said too much now. If Albert Lamar had a mind to, he could tell you some tales that would open your eyes."

"You don't mean to say that there's a regular traffic in information and a swapping of passes to carry it on?"

"Oh, fiddlesticks! your suspicions jump farther and quicker than a bullfrog," declared the other with a note of contempt or disgust in his voice. "Take this pass as an instance. What does it mean? Precisely this: that a young woman from Georgia, with kinsfolk in Maryland, has been caught spying. She was arrested by Stanton's crowd, and would have been hanged if Old Abe hadn't taken her out of Stanton's hands. He had her carried to the White House."

"Well, I wonder!"

"Yes, sir! Had her carried to the White House, and either she's giving trouble, or Mrs. Lincoln is tired of the arrangement. Anyhow, Old Abe wants some Southern man to come after and take her through the lines. That's what I'm told, and I got it pretty straight."

"Well, that takes the rag off the bush!"

"Now, do you know what I'd do if I didn't have a family? I'd take this pass, go right straight to Washington, watch for a chance and fetch Old Abe home with me. That'd end the war, in my judgment. If it didn't, it would make a big man of me. It's a mighty fine chance for some chap that doesn't give a red whether school keeps or not."

"That description fits me to a T," said Francis Bethune, rising from his chair.

One of the parties to the conversation arose also. He was the man who had been dealing out the confidential information. "Well—here! hold on, my friend! You are a gentleman, I hope."

Bethune straightened himself and threw back his head.

"My label is on my valise. Where is yours?"

"Oh, folderol! don't fly up. My name is Phil Doyle."

"Mine is Francis Bethune."

"Very good," said Mr. Doyle. "I reckon I've heard of you. If you belong to the Bethune family you ought to know something about the Cloptons."

"Meriwether Clopton is my grandfather."

"Then you can draw on me for all the good-will you want, and good-will goes a long ways sometimes."

"I had no intention of listening to your conversation up to a certain point, and then I listened for a reason that I'll be glad to explain to you at a more convenient place and time."

"In my room, for instance?" suggested Doyle.

"Certainly, and the present time is as convenient for me as any other."

Excusing himself to the friend with whom he had been talking, Mr. Doyle led the way to his room. He was evidently a man of some importance about the Confederate capital, for his apartments were, for that period, perfect in their appointments.

No long time was required for young Bethune to explain to Mr. Doyle his position and his lack of prospects, and the reasons why he was willing to undertake the adventure which had been suggested.

"Do you mean to tell me," Mr. Doyle exclaimed, after the explanation had been made, "that you propose to make an effort to fetch Mr. Lincoln out of Washington?"

"Certainly; what else can I do? Look at my position and prospects."

Mr. Doyle drummed on the table as though lost in thought. Bethune's imagination conjured up the face of Nan Dorrington, and she seemed to be looking at him through a vague mist, not angrily or contemptuously, as was her habit, but with surprise and sorrow.

At that moment there came a sharp rap on the door, and Colonel Albert Lamar walked in.

"Excuse me, Doyle; I didn't know you had company. Why, hello, Bethune!" he exclaimed, recognizing the young man. "What are you doing here? By the by, did you know——" He paused, took his cigar from his mouth, carefully removed the ash with a wooden toothpick, and blew his breath softly against the glowing end. He evidently had something on his mind which he had intended to speak of.

"Did I know what, Colonel?" Bethune asked.

"We'll speak of it later. Tell me about yourself; how you are getting on, and everything; in short, give me the news. A man who has had to sit up all night with a newspaper to see if his editorial articles have been put in right side up, never knows the value of news after it is in print. To print it is to kill it dead. Tell me something fresh; give me the latest scandal. Has General —— been on another jag?"

—a thin young man with spectacles

In answer to his volley of inquiries Francis Bethune told the story of his own troubles, and when he was quite through Colonel Lamar looked at him seriously for some moments and then indulged in a fit of hearty laughter.

"Some folks might think you get your touchiness from the Huguenot strain; but you don't: you get it from your great-grandfather, Matthew Clopton. Did you ever hear the upshot of his efforts to get justice for Eli Whitney, the inventor of the cotton-gin?"

"Yes, I have heard my grandfather speak of it," said Bethune laughing.

"What was it?" asked Mr. Doyle.

"Well, the farmers and men with money in Georgia and other cotton States combined to rob Whitney. They managed to get some of the judges on their side, and their scheme succeeded completely. Whitney came back to Georgia to fight for his rights, and he was taken up by your great-grandfather, who had plenty of money. But the courts were too much for him. He got hold of one judge and frailed him out, slapped the jaws of another, denounced a third in a public tavern, and then took Whitney home with him to Shady Dale, where he stayed for some time. Old Matt was a war-horse, so the old folks say."

"He must have been," Doyle assented.

"What was the name of the Maryland lady one of your uncles married?" inquired Colonel Lamar in a reminiscent way.

A barely perceptible smile crept into Bethune's countenance. "Elise, she calls herself, but I think the entry in the Bible is Elizabeth. She went back to Maryland when the war came on."

Colonel Lamar nodded his head two or three times. "How old is she?" he asked.

"Why, she must be thirty-five," replied Bethune, "but the last time I saw her she didn't look older than twenty-five, and her head was just as full of romantic stuff as a schoolgirl's. She said she was going back home to be a Confederate spy."

"Just so," responded the Colonel.

Thereupon, as there was a lull in the conversation, Mr. Doyle informed Colonel Lamar that young Bethune had expressed a desire to go to Washington in response to the invitation implied in the pass which had been forwarded to Richmond.

The Colonel looked at Bethune with wide open eyes, in which there was a twinkle of amusement.

"Well, well!" he exclaimed; "it's quite a coincidence."

"What is?"

"Why, the fact that you should be the man to accept the mission."

"What does it coincide with?"

"With—well, you'll find out when you get there."

"I'm not going after the woman," said Bethune. "It is my purpose to bring Mr. Lincoln back with me."

Colonel Lamar threw his head back and laughed heartily.

"If you do that," he remarked, "you'll have a name in history, sure enough. Old Matt Clopton might have done it, or John Clark, or any of the chaps that flourished in Revolutionary days, but we don't measure up to such things these times. We're half a head too low, or we lack some of the muscles that hold a man's gizzard in the right place."

"Well, I may fail," said Bethune, "but I'm not going with the iden of failure in my head."

"In that case, I'd advise you not to go," Colonel Lamar suggested.

But Bethune shook his head. He had made up his mind; he had counted the cost, and all that he asked was that he should be provided with a companion of his own selection.

"Now that makes the business more ticklish than it would otherwise be," said Mr. Doyle. "Whom would you suggest?"

"Billy Sanders. He belongs to Company B, of the Third Georgia."

"Why, I used to know Billy," remarked Colonel Lamar, laughing. "He's what they call a 'character,' and if he sizes up with my recollection, he's just the man that I wouldn't like to take along on such an expedition. Why, he must be sixty years old, and if he hasn't joined the Sons of Temperance he's likely to get you into trouble. The last time I saw him he was sitting on the courthouse steps in Harmony Grove, telling the world at large that he was the grandson of Nancy Hart."

"Can you have him detailed for special duty?" Bethune asked.

"I can—yes," replied Colonel Lamar, hesitating; "but there's a pass for one only."

"With Billy Sanders along, there'll be no need for a pass," said Bethune.

"Well, you'd betteer take it along as a matter of form," suggested the Colonel. "At a pinch it'll save one of you, but it won't save both."

. . . . . .

And so the matter was arranged. Mr. Billy Sanders, who had for years been overseer at Shady Dale, as the Clopton plantation was called, was overjoyed to be with Bethune once more. He had entered the army to be near the young man, but Bethune's company had been transferred to another regiment, and so they had been separated.

"Dog my cats!" exclaimed Billy when they met, "it's like eatin' a slice of biled ham to git a glimpse of you. They tell me you've been cuttin' up jest like you useter when you was a boy. If I'd 'a' been your Colonel I'd 'a' sent for Nan when you got to cuttin' up—be dogged if I wouldn't!"

Bethune blushed at the allusion to Nan's youthful attack on him, but he said nothing in reply. He simply turned his conversation to the adventure to which he was committed, and canvassed it as far as he could. He had never before consulted with Mr. Sanders on any matter more serious than fishing-rods and hooks, and traps for birds or rabbits, and he was therefore surprised at the shrewd common-sense which the older man possessed. Every suggestion he made was marked by that strange intuition which some men possess in moments of great excitement or peril, and which is the every-day equipment of a few minds. On a large and important field of action and endeavor it is called genius; in ordinary affairs it goes by the name of shrewdness, or common-sense, or foresight.

It would be a very gratifying thing to make a hero of young Bethune, with his black hair, his brilliant eyes and his swarthy complexion, but let justice be done in spite of appearances. Mr. Billy Sanders was a very commonplace looking man at best. He carried a smile on his red and rotund countenance that gave him the appearance of childishness or weakness—and he was childish and weak about some things—but in general this bland and innocuous smile was deceitful.

It was as complete a mask, indeed, as ever man wore. There was an innocent stare in the mild blue eyes and a general air of helplessness about the man that went far to confirm the smile.

The most cunning reader of character would have placed Mr. Billy Sanders in the category of weak-minded people—a helpless countryman, ready to be victimized or imposed upon by any chance comer. But in fact, Mr. Sanders was a man of far different mould and mettle. He was old enough to be a good judge of human nature, and the fact that he was born and bred in the country and had little or no book education had not interfered a particle with the growth and development of those elemental qualities which are the basis and not the result of book education. He had, as it were, good blood and strong bones. His grandmother was as perfect a type of the American heroine as has ever been seen, and "Old Bullion" Benton was named after one of his great uncles, Thomas Hart. One who knew Mr. Sanders well remarked of him: "He looks like a busted bank, don't he—all buildin' and no assets. Well, don't fool yourself. There ain't a day in the year, nor an hour in the day when he ain't on a specie basis."

And yet it was not on account of these things that young Bethune selected Mr. Sanders to be his comrade in his projected adventure. His main reason was that he had known Mr. Sanders, and had been familiar with him all his life. He knew that his old friend could be depended on.

It had been arranged that young Bethune should receive the pay of a Captain while detailed for special service, on learning which Mr. Billy Sanders remarked with a broad grin, "You'll be the Cap'n and I'll be the Commissary." It was when they met with Mr. Doyle to lay out a definite program that the true character of Mr. Sanders made itself apparent. Doyle had mapped out the whole route in the most careful manner, and had reproduced it with the accuracy of an engineer or an architect. Mr. Sanders put on his spectacles, examined it patiently, and asked a number of questions, which were glibly answered. Then, looking over his glasses at Mr. Doyle, he inquired:

"Are you comin' along wi' us to keep us on this track?"

"Well, no," replied Mr. Doyle, somewhat taken aback. "There's no necessity for that."

"Then this conflutement," Mr. Sanders remarked, holding the tracing up and smiling benevolently, "ain't worth shucks. The paper's so stiff an' onruly you can't even light your pipe wi' it." With that he crumpled the document in his fist and dropped it in a wooden cuspidor filled with sand and cigar stumps.

"Well, I'll be ——!" said Mr. Doyle under his breath.

MR. BILLY SANDERS

"Me too—me too!" exclaimed Mr. Sanders cheerfully. "I'm truly glad you said the word; it helps me more'n it does you, I reckon." He paused and grew a trifle serious, though he still smiled. "I'll tell you how it is, Colonel," he went on; "if you was to come down yan-way where I live at, an' lay off to hunt wild turkeys, an' I was to come an' fetch you a map of the road you oughter foller, what'd be the state an' feelin's of your sentiments? I'll allow the cases ain't the same, but you'd jest as well try to map out the road a bird'll foller when he gits on the wing. Every time he sees a hawk or hears a gun he'll change his course."

Bethune, who had been somewhat vexed at the cavalier way in which Mr. Sanders had disposed of the map, saw at once that the reasoning was sound. Mr. Doyle seemed to see it, too. At any rate, he assented to the proposition without argument, and after some further conversation in regard to the necessary funds, of which he appeared to have an abundant supply, he took his leave. Later, when he saw Bethune alone, he took occasion to pay a passing tribute to the good sense of Mr. Billy Sanders. And it is a fact that, though Mr. Sanders would have been placed in the illiterate class by a census-taker, he had more real knowledge and native sagacity than one-half the people we meet every day. Some such concession Mr. Doyle made to young Bethune.

But Mr. Sanders insisted on having his suspicions of Mr. Doyle. It was in vain that Bethune pointed out how he had solicited the adventure. "That's as may be," Mr. Sanders remarked. "Albert Lamar don't know enough about him to tell us what he's up to. But don't fret; it'll pop up an' fly out, an' when it does I'll put my finger on it an' let you tell it howdy. I ain't afeard of his capers any more'n if he was a hoss, but I want to know what's behind all this corryspondin' wi' the common enemy, as you may say."

Mr. Doyle tried hard to find out by which route they proposed to reach Washington, but Mr. Sanders hadn't made up his mind, and refused flatly to decide until after they had left Richmond. "The reason I ask," Mr. Doyle explained, "is because I have friends who could help you along, and give you assistance at a pinch."

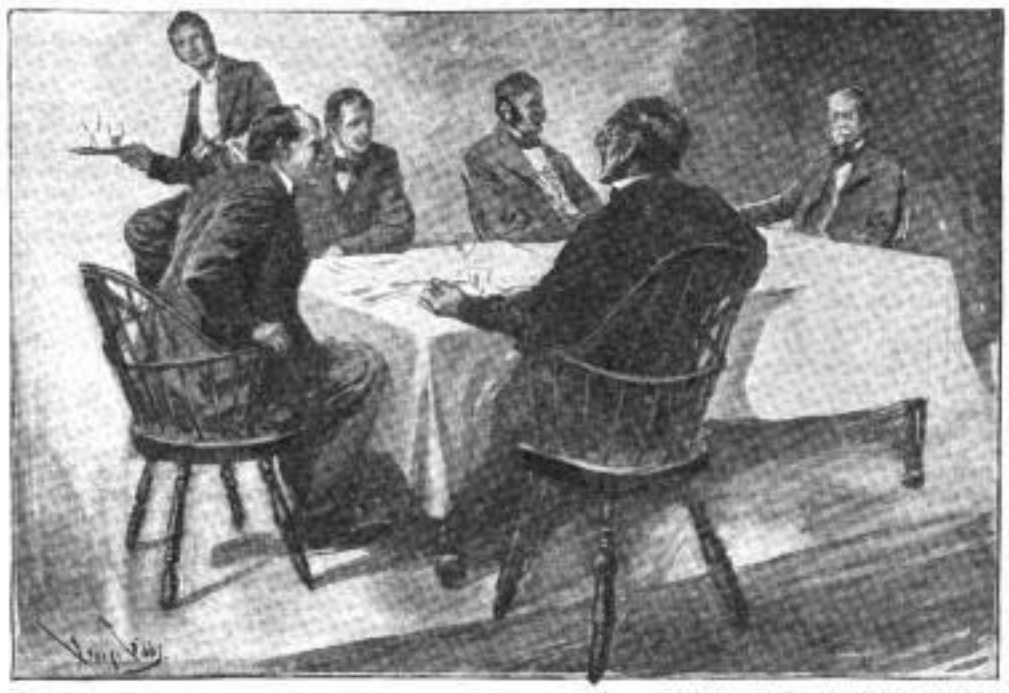
When everything was ready for their departure, Mr. Doyle was informed that they would leave the next morning between midnight and dawn. Shortly after supper he confided to their care a sealed document, with instructions how and where to deliver it. Later, Colonel Albert Lamar saw them, and when Bethune told him about the sealed document, he looked at the ceiling and smoked a while in silence. Finally he remarked:

"I've tried to get under the cover with Doyle, but I can't. He's a head clerk in one of the departments, but I can't find out where he came from nor how he got in. But he's in, and nobody seems to know anything about him."

"As sure as you're born there's something dead up the creek," Mr. Sanders declared.

"Well, on your way to Washington, go to New York," said Colonel Lamar, "put up at the New York Hotel, and make it a point to bow to the head waiter; ask him when he comes to you if his name is McCarthy, then when opportunity offers turn the document over to him. He'll know precisely what to do."

"The head waiter!" exclaimed Bethune, laughing.



"Yes; you won't laugh at him when you come to know him. He's an Irishman."

"Hadn't we better burn the thing now an' be done wi' it?" asked Mr. Sanders.

"No," replied the Colonel; "if the paper's what I think it is, it won't hurt you to have it on you should you chance to be arrested."

. . . . . .

Now, when Francis Bethune and Mr. Sanders were ready to retire—that is to say, when Mr. Billy Sanders was on the point of putting a red flannel cap over his head to keep the bald spot from catching cold, there came a gentle tap on the door, a tiny tap, as if some one had knocked with a pencil or a pipe-stem. As the two made no response, but sat listening, the tap was repeated as gently as before. Whereupon Bethune opened the door, and saw a big, overgrown boy standing there smiling as though he were embarrassed. He seemed to be younger than Bethune by a year or two, and the freshness and innocence of a country life beamed on his handsome countenance and sparkled in his black eyes. He handed Bethune a note penciled on a piece of brown writing paper, the kind fashionable in the Confederacy. It read:

"DEAR BETHUNE: The bearer of this is Mr. John Omahundro, a good friend of mine. He calls at my request, and you may depend on him as you would on me. Luck go with you!

"ALBERT R. LAMAR."

—a great change had come over the hotel waiter

While Bethune was reading this short note, Omahundro, without waiting for an invitation, entered the room, closed the door behind him, and, after bowing to Mr. Billy Sanders, seated himself in a chair. He was evidently not fond of conventions and formalities.

"I saw the Colonel a little while ago," he said, after his name and credentials had been given to Mr. Sanders, "and he asked me to come up and have a talk with you. He says you're going into the North country on account of some business of a man named Doyle."

"That is what Mr. Doyle thinks," replied Bethune.

"Oh, I see!" remarked Omahundro. "Well, that makes me feel better. I don't know what you're up to, and I don't want to know; but I think I know what this man Doyle is up to, and I'll have him run to ground long before you get back. I saw Colonel Lamar just now, and says I, 'Colonel, who's going to leave this hotel between midnight and day?' The Colonel laughed and said it'd be so after a while that cold chills would run up and down his back every time he saw me. 'Who told you about it?' says he. 'Nobody,' says I, 'but I heard a man drop a mighty loud hint a while ago. It's a wonder you didn't hear the echo. I heard him tell the night clerk to wake him up if the men in seventy-eight came down any time between midnight and day. He said they were friends of his and he wanted to tell 'em good-by, and then he took the clerk off to one side and the two of 'em jabbered quite a whet together.' 'That was our friend Doyle,' says the Colonel. 'You've called the turn, color and spot,' says I.

"Well, it was mighty funny to see the Colonel roll the end of his cigar in his mouth. Then, 'Come with me,' he says. He went behind the counter and I followed along. He says to the clerk, 'Oscar, is Doyle a particular friend of yours?' 'Not as you may say particular,' says Oscar. 'Well,' says the Colonel, 'the men in seventy-eight are going away to-night on important business. They're not Doyle's friends, and there's no reason in the world why he should be roused out of bed when they come down.' Oscar seemed to be stumped at this, and he looked as if he was trying to find some way out. So I put in. Says I, 'If they come down before midnight, you don't have to roust your friend out, do you?' His face cleared up at this, and he says, 'No, I don't, for I don't take charge of the desk till midnight.'

"So there you are," Omahundro went on. "Colonel Lamar has paid your bill. I am going a piece of the way myself, and I have two extra horses for Jeb Stuart's use. If you say the word, I'll give you a lift as far as I am going on horseback, and then I'll put you in touch with some of Mosby's men. But to go with me you must start now."

Mr. Billy Sanders sighed, turned and looked at the bed on which he was sitting and patted the comfortable mattress caressingly.

"You'd better hug the pillow," said Omahundro, laughing heartily. "It'll be some days before you'll lay your head on as plump a one." This Mr. Sanders proceeded to do. He took the pillow in his arms and fondled it as a mother would fondle a baby, to the great amusement of his companions.

In twenty minutes the party had passed out of the hotel. On the sidewalk they met Colonel Lamar, bade him good-by, went to a livery stable near at hand, and in a very short time were leaving Richmond behind them as they journeyed toward the front. Two circumstances favored them: the weather was very cold for the time of year—so cold, indeed, that occasionally they dismounted and ran along by the side of their horses to keep their feet warm; and the concentration of Federal and Confederate troops was taking the shape that finally led to the battles of Chancellorsville and Fredericksburg. Their course was in a northwesterly direction after they left the city. Omahundro left Bethune and Mr. Sanders, after making an arrangement whereby they were enabled to purchase two horses which had seen considerable service. In fact, the animals had been turned out to die, but a thrifty citizen had picked them up and attended to their wants so successfully that they showed no evidence of the hard times they had when they went with Stuart around McClellan's army.

Bethune and Sanders made their way to Warrenton, then to Thoroughfare Gap, and thence into what was known as Mosby's Confederacy; then through Ashby's Gap to Berryville, where they were fortunate enough to meet up with three men belonging to Captain McNeill's Rangers, who had been South with a squad of prisoners. McNeill's company operated to some extent in Hampshire County, West Virginia, and it was to this county the three scouts were bound.

Now, Mr. Billy Sanders had from the first insisted that they should make their way to New York by the western route. He had good reason for this. Some of the Harts who used to live in Kentucky had moved to Indiana, and just previous to the war Mr. Sanders had made a visit to that State. He insisted that the Hoosiers talked just like the Georgians—"onless, maybe, they talk a leetle more wi' their nose than we-all do." His program was to go to Ohio, take an eastbound train, and make it known to all who were willing to listen to him that he was going to Washington with his son (Bethune being the son) who had been ill-treated by his superiors because he couldn't show the advance guard of the Fourth Indiana how to wade through a ford on a creek in the State of Tennessee without drawing the fire of Forrest's mounted infantry on the opposite bank, while all the time the water was running like a mill sluice with both gates open. Yes, sirs! And Mr. Hart (the same being Mr. Billy Sander's middle name) was going right to Washington to lay the case before Aberham Lincoln, who would straighten out the tangle, not only because he was a just man, but because the Hart family was as good as any family in Injianny or in Kaintuck, for that matter.

It was a very well-considered program, and it was based on the fact that Mr. Sanders had a secret admiration for Abraham Lincoln. He had read in the papers about the President's humble beginnings, how he studied his books by a lightwood knot fire, and how he had split rails for a livelihood at one period of his career. A hundred times he had remarked to thoughtless persons who were abusing Mr. Lincoln, "He may be wrong in his idees, but I'll bet you a thrip to a gingerrake that his heart's in the right place." Being a plain, blunt man, Mr. Sanders made no bones about giving out this sentiment; it was his boast, indeed, that he was ready to "hand around" his views in any company, and those who didn't like 'em could lump 'em.

Mr. Sanders' program, to employ his own expression, "worked without a bobble." This was due mainly to the fact that the year 1863 opened with very gloomy promises for the Union cause. The people of the North were not only gloomy, but indignant. Criticism of the Administration was general, and was marked by a fury which no one but Mr. Lincoln would have been able to withstand. The cartoonists were especially fierce. One of the cartoons that caught the eye of Bethune as they were journeying by train to the East was the figure of indignant Columbia pointing scornfully at the President and advising him to go tell his jokes elsewhere than the White House. The periodical bore a January date, but some one had torn the page away and tacked it up in the smoking-car, where it had remained.

The Abolitionists had not been much mollified by the Emancipation Proclamation, claiming that it had been delayed too long to produce any favorable results on the course of the war. On the other hand, those who were fighting for the Union itself, without knowing or caring much about slavery either as a political or a moral question, were not at all pleased with what seemed to be the surrender of Mr. Lincoln to an extreme faction, and the slave-owners in the border States were denouncing what they described as high-handed robbery.

It should be said of Mr. Billy Sanders that his spirits rose perceptibly whenever there was danger to be faced, or whenever there was trouble in the air. He walked into the office of the New York Hotel humming his favorite air of "Money Musk." He had begun to call Bethune "Honey," and it was all that the young man could do to keep his face straight when Mr. Sanders solemnly undertook to play the part of a fond father.

On their first appearance at the hotel the clerk held them in parley a little longer than was necessary. The house was practically full, he said, and he had nothing but a very ordinary room on the third floor. If they would wait until after dinner, perhaps he could accommodate them then. Mr. Sanders, for his part, said any kind of a room would suit him, provided he didn't have to roost on a pole like a chicken, or squat flat on the ground like a puddle-duck; still, his son had been sleeping out nights in the war, and he wanted the best of everything—not for himself, mind you, but for his son. Then he turned to Bethune:

"Honey, didn't you say that Mack was stoppin' at this tavern?"

"Yes," replied Bethune.

"Well, if we could see Mack, we'd go like we was greased. Do you know Mack?" he asked the clerk.

"There are so many Macks, you know. Which Mack do you mean?"

"A man named McCarthy. We were recommended to him," replied Bethune at a venture.

The clerk drummed carelessly on the counter while you could count ten. "I know a dozen McCarthys," he said; "but anyhow, Mack or no Mack, I'll assign you to a fairly comfortable room. It has been spoken for, and you may have to exchange it for another."

"All right," said Mr. Sanders; "we ain't noways nice 'bout small matters. If there ain't no bars 'cross the winder an' the key's on the inside we'll manage to worry along. Put our names down, Honey. Some gal might come along an' see 'em an' want to swap letters."

So Bethune wrote "William Hart, Salem, Indianna," and under it "Francis M. Hart," with ditto marks under the town and State. "Be shore you git it right, Honey. I've been so shook up wi' the kyars, an' the racket, that if a man was to ax me right sudden what my name is, I'm afeard I couldn't tell him."

The clerk smiled patronizingly, signaled a porter, and the two travelers were assigned to a room on the third floor—the very one, by the way, in which Colonel Flournoy had his interview with Mr. Barnum of the Secret Service.

"Tell 'em to ring the bell good an' hard when dinner's ready," said Mr. Sanders to the porter. "We'll not keep 'em waitin'. What primpin' I've got to do will be done in short order."

"Dinner will be ready in half an hour, sir," replied the porter, smiling brightly. "The dining-room is on the floor below. You walk down the stairway and turn to the left."

He went out, closing the door gently. "A right peart chap," remarked Mr. Sanders. Then there came a quick, firm tap on the inside door. "Come right in," said Mr. Sanders heartily. Following the invitation, a tall man, arrayed in evening dress, stepped into the room. His face was smooth-shaven, his iron-gray hair combed away from his forehead gave a pleasing softness to features that would have otherwise been marked by sternness, especially at this moment when they wore a frown of irritation or perplexity. Nevertheless, the countenance of the newcomer was both striking and attractive.

"Why, howdy?" said Mr. Sanders. "If I ain't seed you some'r's I'm mighty much mistaken. Wait! don't tell me. I've mighty nigh forgot my own name, but I ain't forgot your face. Hold on! Did you ever so much as hear of a place called Shady Dale?"

"In what State, for instance?"

"Well, in Injianny, for instance."

The newcomer made no reply to the question, but his countenance cleared up and a faint smile hovered about the corners of his mouth. "I heard a rumor that two gentlemen had been commended to a man named McCarthy."

"The head waiter of this hotel," explained Bethune.

"The head waiter of this hotel," assented the newcomer. "I am the man."

"Well, the gallopin' Jerushy!" exclaimed Mr. Sanders. "Why, you look like you jest come from a ball. Honey," he went on, turning to Bethune, "don't you mind the time when a chap come to the Grove in a rig like that and the boys run him down an' ketch'd him an' rode him on a rail?"

"Where was that?" inquired Captain McCarthy.

"All in the State of Injianny, close to Salem." replied Mr. Sanders. "You can't run me out of Injianny to save your life."

"Good!" cried the head waiter. "And now, who commended you to me?" he inquired, lowering his voice.

"Albert Lamar," replied Bethune.

"A fine man that—a fine man!" exclaimed McCarthy.

It required only a few words to explain their reasons for seeing the head waiter. Bethune gave him the dispatch which Mr. Doyle had intrusted to his care.

"This can wait until after dinner," said the head waiter. "I'll join you here about three o'clock."

"I'm mighty glad to hear you mention dinner," remarked Mr. Sanders gratefully.

"It is ready now," said the other. "Shall I have it sent to you?"

"No, no!" protested Mr. Sanders. "I don't want to be penned up wi' my vittles. When I'm hungry I want elbow room."

"Very well," assented the head waiter, somewhat dubiously. "You'll have to be very careful. This house is under suspicion; there are a number of sharp-eyed Government detectives constantly coming and going. You are sure, before dinner is over, to fall into conversation with one or more of them. You'll have to watch your tongues. The smallest slip will be enough. Should I or the waiter who has charge of your table change your glass of water, it will be a warning to be very guarded. Should the waiter inquire if you would like a dish of fried spring onions, you will know that some one within sound of your voice is very dangerous. You may come down when you're ready."

"Say, Colonel," cried Mr. Sanders as the head waiter was entering the adjoining room, "afore them inguns: I'd like a mess on 'em, whether the Boogers ketch us or not."

"Very well, sir," replied McCarthy gravely. On the other side of the door he paused, glanced at himself in the mirror and shook his head doubtfully. "The lad is circumspect, but I'm afraid the old chap is a fool."

In no long time they were in the dining-room, and the head waiter escorted them to the first table on the left of the entrance, where they would be directly under his observation. It was with some difficulty that either Bethune or Mr. Sanders recognized in this obsequious, suave and smiling head waiter the stern and stiff person with whom they had just had an interview. There was no other person at the table, but presently two others came in, one a thin young man with spectacles, who had the air of a divinity student, the other a tall man with Burnside whiskers. Mr. Sanders was sitting at one end of the table next the wall. Bethune was on his left and the divinity student was on his right.

AUTHOR OF THE AMERICAN COMMONWEALTH

THE passionate eagerness with which all Europe has been watching the struggle in South Africa during the last six months tends to throw into the background other questions of not less real and permanent importance, questions which have before now formed the central point of European politics, and which may do so again. Among these is the condition of the always moribund but never expiring Turkish Sultanate. Since another stage in its decadence was marked by the loss of Crete two years ago, the Sultan and his crimes have receded from view, though those who know something about the maladministration and race hatreds in Macedonia, know how critical the situation continues to be there, and how easy it would be for either the Servians or the Bulgarians to light up an insurrection in those regions which would involve all Eastern Europe in the flames of war. Fortunately, the Austrian Government, which controls Servia, and the Russian, which now controls Bulgaria, are agreed in desiring to see peace preserved for the time being; so things remain tolerably quiet, and the only change likely to occur in the near future is the erection of Bulgaria into a kingdom, an access of dignity which Prince Ferdinand is believed to desire and to be steadily working for.

The Progressive Policy of the German Emperor

Meanwhile, some very interesting developments have been going forward in Asia Minor. It is now at least twenty years since the idea of possible German action in that region presented itself to forecasting minds, though under the régime of Bismarck, who was severely practical and averse to new or speculative enterprises, little or nothing was done to push forward such action. By degrees, however, German officers began to be engaged to reform the army system of the Turks, and German capitalists were found at Constantinople pressing for, and before long obtaining, concessions for railways, for mines, and for other large industrial enterprises. The Emperor William the Second has encouraged his subjects to embark their capital in Turkey, seeing in this another market for German industry and another field for German enterprise. His courtesies to Abdul Hamid, which caused some surprise in 1895 and 1896, and which culminated in his visit to that monarch in November, 1898, have usually been attributed to this motive. The Germans have been extremely successful. They have quite superseded the English, who used to play the leading part in the commercial and industrial affairs of the Turkish Empire, for ever since the taking of Cyprus by the English Government in the days of Lord Beaconsfield, and the vehement condemnation of Turkish cruelties by Mr. Gladstone, England has been the Power most odious to the Sultan, while since the Armenian massacres of 1895-6 it has been recognized that there can be no more of such protection given to the Sultan by the English as was given in the old days when England thought it essential to her interests to check the approach of Russia toward Constantinople. The Germans receive from their Ambassador that diplomatic support which is essential in an Eastern court, and they have shown great energy, especially in projecting railways. Recently a concession has been granted to them for extending the railway from Constantinople to Angora, already built by German capital, farther out southeastward from across the centre of Asia Minor and through Mesopotamia to the Persian Gulf.

The Balance of Interests in Asia Minor

Russia could not be indifferent to the sanction thus given to an enterprise of such magnitude. Some think that she resisted it. Others, with more apparent reason, hold that she had been previously "squared" by Germany, as it is pretty certain that England was squared by the secret agreement concluded between her and Germany in 1898. It is a first principle of German imperial policy not to quarrel with Russia. Be this as it may, Russia used the event as a basis for the demand to have her right to similar railway concessions in another area recognized; and the Sultan, with much reluctance, has found himself obliged to yield to this demand. He had nowhere to turn to for support, for while France, of course, always supports Russia, Germany, having had her own share, could not in this instance interfere against her, and England no longer comes into question.

Thus there has been effected by these railway arrangements a virtual partitionment of Asia Minor into two "spheres of influence," to adopt the expression which has been used in Africa and in China to mark the acquisition of European claims to territories not yet actually annexed by European claimants. Germany takes the south and southeast of the country; Russia the north and northeast.

Whether Russia will proceed to build the railways which she is now authorized to make may be doubted. Industrial and commercial undertakings beyond her own borders are not an object to her, as they are to Germany, England and France. So far from needing outlets for the employment abroad of her spare capital, like those countries, Russia needs all her own capital, and as much more as she can borrow on easy terms, for the opening up of her internal communications and the development of her domestic industries. The Germans, however, will doubtless make their railway. They have promised to offer part of the capital to be subscribed in France, with the view to propitiating French opinion, and it is believed that the enterprise may turn out a pecuniary success. Much of Asia Minor is so thinly peopled as to present no great prospect of local passenger traffic, but the country is naturally rich, and the Euphrates Valley still richer. At present there are hardly any roads fit for wheeled traffic, so trade finds no outlet. All that there is will in future flow to the railway, which ought, before many years, to produce a powerfully stimulating effect upon these long-neglected regions. It is more difficult to conjecture whether German colonization will follow, yet this is insomewise impossible, for there are already flourishing German settlements in Palestine, and in Germany itself a sudperahtan dant popu- lation

The Passive Strength of Russian Inertia

Russia can afford to wait. She has scored a great success. She has made another of those onward steps by which, more frequently without war than through war, her territory is constantly growing, and her influence extending beyond the limits of her territorial authority. She is now predominant in Persia, a hopelessly feeble State with a vast area and a scanty population, which is always seeking fresh outlets. Anyhow, the German interests which will spring up along the line are sure to give the German Empire a solid and permanent interest in the country, and an effective voice in determining its future when the Sultanate comes to that end which those who know Turkey so fervently desire.

She is also predominant in Manchuria, and will, when her Trans-Siberian Railway has been completed, be able to terrorize China. Across the whole length of Asia, from the Black Sea on the west to the Yellow Sea on the east, she can, when she pleases, add without difficulty many thousands of square miles to her dominions. Having time on her side, she is prudently anxious to perfect her railway system and have some money in hand before she absorbs fresh districts on which much money would have to be spent.

The times have been when such an advantage as Russia has gained by the virtual admission of her influence over the whole northern part of the Turkish Empire would have filled the English with alarm and aroused them to opposition. Even so late as 1878, Lord Salisbury's Anglo-Turkish convention bound England to defend by arms the Turkish frontiers against the Czar. But England is now so absorbed in her South African troubles as to have no thought of those interests in the Orient which were lately held so precious. She has not even obtained compensation from the Sultan for the injuries suffered by her subjects in the Constantinople massacre of 1896. To be sure, she does not wish to resort to force, the only argument which affects the Turkish mind, and her abstention is more easily explained than the strange forbearance of successive American Presidents, who have not yet extorted (as they might easily have done in their exceptionally favorable position) compensation for the outrages and injustices inflicted upon American citizens.

Sudden and startling as this change in English policy is, it is not to be regretted. It had become impossible for England to support the Turks, and it was impossible for her to replace their bad government by a better one of her own. She was too far off—she has her hands already too full in other places. She may see without disquiet the partitionment of Asia Minor between Germany and Russia, for she was not in a position to claim a share, even would it have been to her interest to do so. Egypt, which she has got already, which she has done much to improve, and which she seems now likely to keep, is really a burden rather than a source of strength. The influence of Germany cannot fail to better the lot of the unfortunate Christian subjects of the Turk, nor will she show herself unfriendly to American missions and to Western education, as the Russians sometimes do. And if England wishes to keep Russia from coming down to the coasts of the Levant, the interposition of Germany is, from the English point of view, to be regarded as an absolute gain.

These, however, may be deemed minor matters. The great fact which stands out is the admission which Russia has at last secured of her exclusive influence over the whole northeast of the Turkish dominions, and the acquiescence of her three old antagonists of Crimean war days. France is silent, because she must have the alliance of Russia at all costs. England is silent for the reasons already set forth. Austria and Italy follow Germany, and Germany has got her own share. We seem at last to see, in dim foreshadowings of the future, the outlines of a settlement of that "Eastern Question" which has so grievously perplexed English and Continental statesmen for more than a century.

Quotations on South African Celebrities

THERE are many ways better than reading editorials in the newspapers of telling how a nation esteems its great men. The "button" craze, as American children know it, has attacked England with violence, and the child who has not his chest well plastered with button portraits of the commanders in the South African war might well have Stevenson's words applied to him:

> "He is a naughty boy, I'm sure,
> Or else his dear papa is poor."

The buttons were all originally a penny, but as the war went on quotations began to be established. "Bobs" rose to three halfpence, and then to twopence. For a brief period he stood at threepence. Baden-Powell made one leap to threepence, and for a time wasn't to be had even at that. Buller was sluggish. He never fell below par, but he never rose above it.

And what price did Methuen bring? His button failed to circulate.

In Ireland, Joubert and Kruger stood firm for some time, but the enthusiasm incident to the Queen's visit to Dublin knocked a considerable bit of the bottom out of the market.

Literary Folk as they Came and Went With Ourselves

By Elizabeth Stoddard

"What mystery lurks in this retroversion, or
What half Januses are we that cannot look forward
With the same idolatry with which we forever revert!"

Something answering them has had a being. Their importance is from the past.—CHARLES LAMB.

THERE is no profession, perhaps, in which ambition o'erleaps itself as in the literary profession, especially with the writers of verse. Many are called—by themselves; but few are chosen—by the public. Charlotte Brontë's "abundant shower of curates falling upon the North of England" was trifling compared with the rain of poets, ever increasing, which has fallen upon this house. Of the poets since 1860, doubtless some will have a place in Mr. Stedman's new anthology. Among the dead I recall two who, dying young, left some good work: Robert Weeks, of New York, and Charles Luders, of Philadelphia. Hither came the volumes of verse with the "Compliments of the publisher," or the "Respects of the author," many with explanatory suggestions for the benefit of the reviewer, who had been there himself, and therefore was qualified to give all that was due. There was a merit in these numerous books, inasmuch as they were not tomes, but small and thin, so that fifty poets could be packed on the shelf where the ten volumes of Pepys' Diary had stood.

In the room where I am writing the walls are lined with the poets, from Bishop Percy's Reliques to Kipling's ballads, and just now, looking for a book, I happened to see four volumes published by Putnam in 1864, when patriotism was rampant at the North and the South, when the eyes of Blue and Gray were bloodshot with rancor, and so, when the duel was over, and they had achieved such ability as to kill 7000 men in half an hour, the way was prepared for patriotic songs. In one of these volumes, Rebel Lyrics, of two or three hundred pages, I note the names of repute—Gilmore Simms, Henry Timrod and Paul H. Hayne. These songs "fired the Southern heart." In the Lyrics of Loyalty, the names are famous—Longfellow, Lowell, Taylor, Emerson and Holmes. Few have seats in the hall of the immortals.

The whirligig of time has again spun into notice the writings of the best poet of the South, Henry Timrod, who was on the staff of Governor Pickens, of South Carolina, during the war. A new edition of Timrod's poems has recently been published. Another fine poet died recently—Mrs. Mary Bradley. She, with her sister, Mrs. Festetits, has written some sixty volumes of stories for Sunday-school young people. In Mr. Stoddard's review of her poetry he claims for Mrs. Bradley high qualities which he does not find in our American poets—in melody and in order of language; the words seem to come of their own volition. To me, Mrs. Bradley voices the flowers. I quote a few lines:

"With every flower's analysis
He looked into a lovely soul;
Its passion or its pure repose,
Its sorrow or its sin, who knows?
He knew it as he knew the rose."

The trumpeter of Fame she never beckoned to, and so his trumpet has never blown for her the loud blast that is sounding through the land at present, both in verse and prose.

One winter morning, about '51, I met Mr. Stoddard at the Church of the Good Shepherd, and was married to him by the pastor, Rev. Ralph Hoyt, a poet also. Ever since I have occasionally repeated his lines:

"Still sighs the world for something new,
Imploring me, imploring you
For something new.
Oh, hapless world, what will it do
Imploring me, imploring you
For something new!"

Our witness was Richard Kimball, the author of St. Leger. I scarcely looked at him, but felt that he was out of place in the shabby old church, with a great hole in the aisle carpet showing an island of board. There should have been, besides this witness, a couple of robin redbreasts, in case leaves were wanted, for there was small prospect of subsistence for the wedded pair. I returned to my country home, already broken, and to be forsaken. My friends and neighbors said with compassion that they were not surprised that I should marry, but that I should have married a poor man had been considered as impossible, so I was consigned to the poet's garret and its starvation crust. It was not long before Mr. Stoddard followed me, from Boston, where Ticknor & Fields had published his first book of verse. As a presage of his ability in regard to housekeeping, he brought me a present of an expensive tête-à-tête china set. One point to be considered was that his verses were superior to his means. It was all in keeping with our appearances that Mr. Stoddard should come to the conclusion that there was no place more suitable for an impecunious couple than this city; but even then Elijah's ravens were on their way to feed us with their horny beaks. For some time we lived apart; I with my brother in a boarding-house that resembled Mrs. Todger's, though there was no Bailey to serve us. At length we hired the second floor of a house in Henry Street, and went to housekeeping with very small materials.

But all our wiser, loving days began.

At this time there was not so much said about "woman's sphere," and clubs had not yet loomed above our horizon, but all the same I proposed taking up life on philosophic lines, and began to read Comte to Mr. Stoddard in the most positive manner. If Comte was to develop the "religion of humanity," I meant to have some, but it did not seem to reach us helpfully. We had books besides, and had to read them, having little else to amuse us, excepting a small connection with the New York Albion. Mr. Stoddard wrote book notices, dramatic criticisms, and an occasional poem for this paper. The proprietor and editor was Mr. William Young, an Englishman. Is there any journalist of the day who would do such work without an intimation from either side that some recompense would be acceptable?

A less dignified "job" was the editing of a paper, the Yankee Notions—salary $20 a month. I did not hold the pens as Dora did for David Copperfield, but I sat upon the floor and helped Mr. Stoddard patch out the pictures with the text. The character of the paper may be shown by this anecdote with the picture of two darkies meeting. One carried a small coffin and told the other that he was going "black-berrying."

I could not at once adjust myself to the new condition. It was not homesickness, for my old home was falling into "cureless ruin," but the separation from all that I did and had made me lonesome—no more mounts on the dolphin Pleasure, no more sailing parties in summer, sleighing parties in winter—the bowstring of destiny was around my neck. Owing to the little surprise I gave my friends in my marriage, for a time they felt an aloofness that kept them away. The Muses, too, were distant, remaining at home, on the borders of the Pierian Spring.

That summer was a solitude with one agreeable break. The poet-painter, Buchanan Read, upon returning from Italy, had settled in Bordentown with his family. For some time an acquaintance had been established between three young men who met occasionally in New York—Bayard Taylor, George H. Boker and Buchanan Read. As I had not seen any of them, it was agreeable to receive an invitation from Mr. Read to spend a day or two at his cottage. We went on Saturday, to return on Monday. In the cottage was a family in miniature: Mr. Read was small and delicate, Mrs. Read more so, and the two little chicks of children more than both together. The cottage was near the Bonaparte estate. In the afternoon, with Mr. Read, we walked about it. The mansion was in the heart of the landscape, and was then occupied by the son of Bonaparte's intendant, and his wife, who was the sister of Julia Ward Howe. All that nature and art could do was done there. Reading lately one of Lloyd Mifflin's classical sonnets, I recalled that landscape, and, barring the Naiads and the Fauns, it will answer for a description of it; the beauty of the lines I quote should suggest the whole:

"Nor in these valleys where we now recline,
But far beyond those purple peaks that glow
Lies the fair land I love. There winds are low,
There upland streams, dissolving, reach the vales,
And there are groves of ilex and of yew,
Unending valleys and Illyrian dales."

How Mr. Read could withhold his brush from painting those lovely views was incomprehensible. In the morning an admirer of Mr. Read came out from Philadelphia—Mr. Hammersmith, we will say—and most of the hours left us were passed in a discussion between him and Mr. Read on his recent volume of verse, The Closing Scene, and quotations from its reviewer in the North British Quarterly, now from one, and now from the other, always premising with "The critic of the North British says," though both knew that Coventry Patmore wrote the review. Mr. Stoddard was not prompt with his interest in the discussion, and Mrs. Read, a sad, quiet woman, disappeared then, and we came away with a vast impression of the Bonaparte estate. Mr. Read was fortunate to find in a wealthy Philadelphian a patron who bought his pictures and assisted him on his trips abroad. It was not long after our visit that we bade Mr. Read farewell at the Astor House on his way to Italy again for an indefinite time.

Mrs. Read died there; he returned to America, married again, and started for Italy. In mid-ocean he passed the steamer conveying the coffin with Mrs. Read's remains to this country. We did not meet again till toward the close of our Civil War.

The emblems of royalty and beauty of the Bonaparte place faded upon my discovery of a something brooding in our atmosphere separate from Comte and the Yankee Notions. Mr. Stoddard did not share wholly in my fool's paradise; even with the failure of my plan, and expectance of prosperity, my sense of security continued—my bread was good, and my clothes were not worn out. Though of Scotch ancestry, I was not brought up on the "bang goes saxpence" of the Scotch system. I learned in childhood that most of the people in our village lived differently from my people; several experiences taught me that, though there was little or no sense of caste then. I do not forget my introduction to a slice of bread and molasses, which the mother of one of my schoolmates gave me when she took me to her home at recess.

One day Mr. Stoddard mentioned that he was going to Concord to visit Mr. Hawthorne, and went. He found Mr. Hawthorne all that was agreeable. His son Julian was playing about the study table, a little, handsome boy, with no disposition to mind what was told him. When Mr. Stoddard asked for Mr. Hawthorne's influence in obtaining a place in the New York Custom House, with his college friend, General Pierce, then President, this influence was cheerfully promised, and a few days after Mr. Stoddard's return, Colonel Whipple and Senator Atherton, of New Hampshire, appeared in New York to give advice and direction. Mr. Stoddard went to Washington with a passport which let him into the White House early one morning. President Pierce received him kindly, wrote a brief note to Mr. Bronson, the Collector, and "hey, presto!" Mr. Stoddard was appointed to the debenture-room in the Custom House, where he remained as the "head" of it for sixteen years, despite the title of "copperhead" which somebody gave him, believing he sympathized with the South. I soon paid him a visit. The debenture-room was dingy and stony, and full of fifteen or twenty old men who arose to their feet as if a gay and giddy butterfly had sailed in. They were rheumatic and knotty, lame and halt. One could not help thinking of some lines of the slim, boyish figure whom they surrounded:

"We are best with age and cares,
In the last of our gray hairs,
And we lean upon our staffs,
Looking for the epitaphs;
For we are the last, the last
In the ruins of the past."

It is to be hoped that they were not thinking of the epitaphs of the four years' rotation. For me, I was as sure of my share of the appointment as if it was a sinecure.

We rented rooms in Henry Street from the owners, an old man, sickly, and an old woman in black bombazine, whose mission in life was to nag and to complain; in appearance she resembled Sairey Gamp's invisible friend, Mrs. Harris.

With the first month's stipend of the customs gold we moved. It had been one of our cheap pastimes to walk "around," of afternoons and early eves, and on one of our strolls we had discovered an old wooden house, white, with green shutters, in Sands Street, Brooklyn, below St. Ann's Church, with its lawn and trees which stood where the piers of the Brooklyn Bridge now stand. The house belonged to a cheery old sea-dog; it had an old-fashioned garden, neglected, but lovely with its lilac bushes and great red clumps of peonies, and that dear vanished rose, the damask. I liked to step in the fallen leaves and weed out the dry stalks; there was scarcely a modern blossom in the garden. I was delighted to discover one day a flower of my childhood—London Pride. Does anybody see London Pride in these days? The most athletic plants were the rows of hollyhocks by the back paling. They seemed a "reserve," to be called out if the other flower cohorts should fail.

We tried to take up housekeeping in good form. Continuing our vesper walks, we aimed for the shop windows to get ideas. The china shops were trying, but, with much looking, twenty-five dollars' worth of white china, with a band of gold on the edges, was purchased. Its shine was beautiful, but it did not conceal our three-pronged forks.

MRS. STODDARD—from an Old Daguerreotype

There were waits between the things we bought. The next was a Brussels carpet of superior sort, with enormous scrolls, and leaves unknown to Nature. Its colors were so brilliant it warmed the feet when stepped on. After that came chairs with green "reps," and two great bookcases, finer than all the rest. We little thought then what demoniac behavior these would show. Then I bought an account book. These first month's expenses were out of proportion; for instance:

Grocer		Sundries
One-half pound of tea,	60c.	Dentist,	$2.00
One dozen eggs,	13c.	Hoops,	3.00

Living was cheap then, and more simple than now. Our rent for two parlors, bedroom and kitchen was $300; porterhouse steak eighteen cents a pound, and Alexander's gloves seventy-five cents a pair. Clothes came to stay then. A winter bonnet was worn all winter, and a summer bonnet all summer. My housekeeping seemed mean in comparison, and at home we should have called it "small potatoes"; for instead of my cellar being filled with winter fruit and vegetables and other provender, and the buttery always full and its row of great milk pans armored with cream, I bought food by the pound and quart, and a can of milk a day for four cents. I brought a servant from New Bedford whose sisters had served in my family, and I remember her look of scorn, especially at Thanksgiving, when only a quart of cranberries came in, and we had but one pumpkin pie. I am sure that cooking is a gift, like poetry. This young girl was a perfect cook, and her wages were six dollars a month. I have never found her equal. At the end of the year she left me, having a prejudice against mothers-in-law, and mine was expected to join us.

Ah me! Sands Street is in my memory, as it was in fact, an oasis; there were no Arabs to steal away with one infesting care. I sometimes felt a little impatience, being alone so much, for, like Jane Eyre's Rochester, I wanted to be "gregarious," and I still missed the open door of the country, where there are so many interests in common—that cheering gossip, which, being transferable, nobody is responsible for. The monotony was soon to be broken. Mr. Stoddard came home one day with an invitation to dine out the next evening. He had met a whilom acquaintance, an enterprising man, who affected literature, had been a Unitarian minister, and at present was the editor of a campaign Democratic newspaper. He was a Bohemian at heart, but I do not think that he patronized true Bohemian life. He had been very kind to Mr. Stoddard, and believed in him when he was little known. Mr. Barton, as I will name him, was now married, he told Mr. Stoddard, and his wife would welcome me. General George P. Morris was to be at the dinner, and some other General whose name I have forgotten. Certainly I wished to go; had I not wailed at the piano, and begged the woodman to spare G. P. M.'s tree? The visit was a thing to remember, and we spent the night.

We arrived first. Mrs. Barton, I soon learned, was a refined, amiable woman with literary intentions. The inside of the house looked as if the occupants had lately come in, or were going out. Mr. Barton presently came in with a market basket and his two Generals, and we sat down to dinner in a small basement room. Mr. Barton's son, a little boy, waited on the table, and his first feat was to tip a plate of soup over the sleeve of my new dress. The dinner was a good one, if it was partly out of the market basket. Mrs. Barton and I left the table and went to walk among the trees and boulders, and after slipping over the latter, went back, and General G. P. Morris was kind enough to sit by me and converse on his poetry. The "woodman's tree" was not "spared," and by implication I understood that he was the power on the Home Journal, instead of Willis, and that he was the New York correspondent of a Liverpool paper, and all the time I was thinking he was not a poet. I think he affected a military bearing. I never saw him again, but I heard that he had all his poems beautifully bound, and kept them on his centre-table.

When we began to have fires in our parlor grate and the evenings grew longer, the Muse crept in. It was then that Mr. Stoddard wrote the poem which has taken the most frequent and the longest journeys of any of his poems:

"There are gains for all our losses."

I cannot say whether it was from sympathy or the fervor of poesy, but I, too, attempted to be an Arcadian. I began some verses which cost me infinite strivings and labor, and I never forget the sublime patience of my fellow-poet as I produced a line and read it. He did not ridicule me, or laugh at me, but let me do it. At the proper time and occasion he was the severest critic, and his fiat of "This won't do" was final. Looking over some papers lately these verses appeared, and I offer a sample as an object-lesson:

"My goldfinch chirps in his dreams;
The white lilies droop in the odorous air,
My dog is asleep in his master's chair!"

"The roar of the river comes up to my ear
Ere day in my depths of misty brine
The black hulks of the ships will plummet-like sink,
And the white hands of the drowned in the weeds entwine;
Still the living over its bosom float
And the distant lights of the city shine!"

Some weeks before this effort, Paul Hayne, a budding poet then, the nephew of the Hayne of the Webster notoriety, and the editor of a Southern literary journal, came here on his bridal tour and paid us a visit. They were like a couple of children, and the first of our "carriage company," disdaining to walk at all. Mr. Hayne lost his fortune in the Civil War. I had the temerity to send these verses to him, and he not only accepted them, but sent me a check for six dollars, and an apology for its smallness. I am afraid I owed it to his respect and admiration for Mr. Stoddard. We were now beginning to learn what Shakespeare wrote: "There's more that knows Tom Fool than Tom Fool knows." Mr. Stoddard kept up a favorite diversion of frequenting the old and new book-stores and the publishers. At one of them he was introduced to Rev. William C. Richards, who had deferred preaching for a matter of business, and had come to New York as an agent and buyer of books for Southern libraries. He had brought his family, and had taken a house in the newly built-up, or half built-up, Eighteenth Street, off Second Avenue. There was nothing to be done but that Mr. Stoddard should bring me that very evening to see Mrs. Richards and a few friends, and we went. The moment we entered I saw there was to be no formality. Chairs were being brought in from upstairs. As Mr. Richards was a most hospitable man, I think more came than were expected, but it made no difference to Mrs. Richards. She was so affluent herself that the shade of poverty fled from her, though I doubt if Mr. Richards knew then where the next month's rent was to be found. He was a very different man from Mr. Barton, but there were the underlying traits of the adventurer and the spirit of restlessness. Among the company was Alice B. Neal, sister of Mrs. Richards, a popular writer for Appleton, and the young Mrs. Bradley, her sister-in-law, whose friendship was ended by death only recently. Miss Caroline May, a poetess, the author of several volumes of verse, was another of the guild. She sang for us The Long, Long, Weary Day. There was also a very beautiful young girl, related to the Hayne family, who then had an infatuation for Gottschalk, the pianist, and was stage-struck besides. "It was her own choice," she said afterward, "to join Mr. Gottschalk." She failed miserably on the stage, but I know she had great kindness of heart. She had some means and helped the needy; indeed her death was from an act of kindness. She took an ailing dog belonging to a friend to nurse, and died from hydrophobia. I have one more guest to name who came in late: G. P. R. James, who was then English consul at Norfolk; a sturdy, thick-set Englishman, who lightly bore the weight of his novels and "their solitary horseman."

This was my first reception where Mr. Stoddard was a "feature." He was never much of a success as a lion; in looks he was well enough, but his roar was small. I may remark here why this was interesting to me, from the fact that the Southerners there knew his work. He was more read in the South then than he was in New England, and always, I believe, the Southern writers came to see him, and wrote to him more than Northerners did even then. One thing I noticed with the former, that they spoke of each other as "gentlemen," not as "men," and that most of them had a touch of the negro dialect.

In an earlier visit to New York a friend had taken me to Miss Lynch's Saturday Evenings in Ninth Street as a looker-on of the literary, artistic, musical creators, such as could not be seen elsewhere, and which made those evenings celebrated. When quite young Miss Lynch was the governess of Professor Horsford's daughters, and when talking together of a career, hers was to be exactly what it proved to be as Miss Lynch and Mrs. Botta, for she was the only one in New York who held a salon from forty-eight, or thereabouts, till ninety-four. The house on Ninth Street was let to lodgers, excepting the rooms she and her mother occupied. The receptions were on the first floor. We took our wrappings off in a narrow extension, placing most of them on the floor. My friend expressed a wish that I should meet at her house two young men: Bayard Taylor, and one whose dramatic notices and poems I had seen in the New York Albion, whose name was R. H. Stoddard. Neither appeared, so my imagination was left at large to invoke the figure as I wished it to appear. When I went to the theatre I selected the handsomest, best-dressed dandy in the pit as the probable dramatic critic. When the real person came in view the ideal dropped out entirely.

Nobody knew how Miss Lynch achieved her purpose. She was not handsome nor brilliant, and was poor. At that time it was said she had petitioned every member of the Congress then sitting for a pension on account of her father's services as a purser in the Navy; and she got it. After this it was discovered that she was heir to some land in the West, purchased as waste land, and built upon till it became a part of a city, and valuable. It brought fortune to her, and she bought a handsome house in Twenty-fifth Street, quite uptown then, and married the Italian Professor Botta. She continued the receptions on a larger scale, but the same, except that Professor Botta introduced a punch bowl in the hall window. It was his chief duty to walk about and ask the company if it had had a glass of "poonch." It was not usual then to do anything to amuse us, but once I heard Mr. Story read a poem of his, in silk stockings and pumps, and all the time I was thinking of the stories one of his college chums used to tell me of "Bill Story's" capers, and of my brother's meeting him in Gibraltar, where Mr. Story induced him to buy an enormous deerskin overcoat which he didn't want; but Mr. Story was all that was charming.

MRS. STODDARD IN HER LIBRARY

At Mrs. Botta's in the years following I met great generals, actors, artists, musicians and travelers—one lion to a reception, and a hand of admirers. As a whole, the "upper ten," now diminished to "four hundred," avoided Mrs. Botta's receptions. It may have read books, but writers were ignored. "Society" has never recognized the literary class here. It is to be regretted that Mrs. Botta did not write her recollections; they would have given her more distinction than her poems brought. Her record is one of kindness, and she gave her help to the struggling artist and writer of her day.

A very different woman held receptions for a season. Mrs. Caroline Kirkland, having made a reputation in the West by her New Home; or, Who Will Follow? and other stories, came to New York on a new venture, to edit the Union Magazine. She was that sort of woman of whom people say, "She knows her own mind." When I entered her crowded rooms and heard that continuous talk—roar—I felt my old scare at celebrities creeping over me, and when Mrs. Kirkland accosted me in regard to the foolishness of my marriage, the trepidation was complete. I could not quite say, "What are you going to do about it?" But she was a person of strong sense—a business woman and an able one. When she went to Europe she proved the latter by engaging Bayard Taylor to edit her magazine for twenty dollars a month. What would Mr. Gilder or Mr. Burlingame think of such a salary?

When the late George Putnam started Putnam's Magazine he also started receptions at his house in Sixteenth Street. Mrs. Kirkland encouraged him by saying that his new carpet was the handsomest in New York. We all looked at it and agreed with her. Mr. Putnam gave us most excellent coffee downstairs—an agreeable innovation.

With this group I have two more women who entertained in this fashion: Mrs. Elizabeth Oaksmith, who died at the age of eighty-seven, in 1893, at Hollywood, North Carolina, and Mrs. Cleveland, the sister of Horace Greeley. Mrs. Oaksmith was our first woman lecturer, and a fluent writer. In the opinion of the critics of the day, Poe, Hoffman and the prominent writers, she gained a "national reputation." At sixteen she married Seba Smith, the author of Major Jack Downing's Letters, but, not liking the name, obtained from the Legislature a permit to change it to Oaksmith. Mr. Smith refused to add the Oak, as plain Smith "was good enough for him." Mrs. Oaksmith lived here a short time, and I met her with her sons grown about her. She was, as a true biographer ought to say, "of aristocratic mien": handsome, and one whose will never bent except for her own purpose. Appleton Oaksmith, handsome like his mother, made a stir in our war time. He ran slaves into places where he expected to be safe. It was said he scuttled one vessel with two hundred slaves, while he escaped on his consort ship. He was captured at Fire Island while waiting for a bark to be fitted out as a slaver, and was put in Fort Lafayette, Fort Warren and the Boston jail. His escape from the last made a furor. After the war Appleton was prominent in the South, and died some years after. From here they moved to Patchogue. Mr. Smith died there in 1868, and Mrs. Oaksmith refused to go to his bedside, and when she was brought there for burial there was not a single mourner.

It strikes me in this account of Mrs. Oaksmith I have done more for morals than I have for literature; but to me, with the exception of Charlotte Cushman, she was the most striking woman of the day.

Not a Question of Evidence

By Elizabeth Phipps Train

IT WAS the "rush" hour at the elevated railway stations. Swarms of passengers pushed, jostled and crowded each other in their frantic efforts to secure accommodations in the homeward-bound trains after the weary working hours of the day were over.

As I felt the crowd surge upon me I set my teeth and vowed by all my gods that they should not prevail to dislodge me. A moment longer, I whispered encouragingly to my failing forces; only a moment—and then, as I was about to mount into the car, a heavy man came jostling so violently against me as nearly to throw me beneath the wheels. Completely out of temper, I gave vent to an angry outburst, and turned to confound the offender with a glare, when to my astonishment I perceived him to be no less a person than Schuyler Newbold, and to my mortification discovered that he was making a very unmistakable attempt to elude my notice by escaping into the adjoining car. As, however, in turning, I caught his glance, he flushed somewhat confusedly, lifted his hat, and, abandoning his intention, murmured a word or two of awkward apology for stumbling against me, and followed me to a seat.

"Has anything happened, Mr. Newbold?" I asked, as we sat down together. "You don't seem yourself. I even think you are bored at having to join me."

Perhaps my remarking upon his abortive effort to escape recognition was not in the best possible taste, but, to tell the truth, I should have perceived another man's attempted avoidance of me with positive indifference compared with the pique which his action inspired. Although I could not flatter myself that Schuyler Newbold could be justly reckoned among the number of my professed admirers, a number which, as in the cases of most young and handsomely jointured widows, was neither small nor of entirely insignificant quality, yet there was among the lot none who so interested and attracted me as this man, of whom I knew and saw less than of any of the others.

I had met him now and again in society, in good, if not great, houses, had heard him spoken of by his associates as the type of a successful self-made man, had received him occasionally in my own house, and had gone greater lengths, perhaps, in the endeavor to make myself agreeable to him than I was commonly disposed to do. And lately it had seemed to me that I was not wholly indifferent to him.

He received my remark with such obvious embarrassment that I could not refrain from scrutinizing him rather closely.

"I—er, to tell the truth——" he stammered, twisting his brown mustache with nervous fingers, "well, to be quite frank with you, Mrs. Allaire, I did want to see a man in the other car."

He did not meet my glance as he spoke, and I knew what he said was a mere fabrication, a subterfuge invented by way of excuse. The thought that he was deceiving me made me furious. I shrugged my shoulders, and in a white heat turned my face to the window, saying coldly:

"How useful a part that other man plays in the lives of your sex! The feminine headache and the male acquaintance of doubtful identity!"

He did not reply at once. His unresponsiveness provoked my curiosity, and I turned and looked at him. His eyes were fixed upon me with a singular intentness. I could not fathom their expression, so varied were its elements. Tenderness, regret, remorse, compunction, despair—all these seemed parts of it.

"You accuse me of prevarication," he returned in a low, uncertain voice, coloring to the roots of his hair. "Well, you are right. My man in the other car was one of straw. I had my own reasons for avoiding you—reasons which—— But I cannot recount them to you. They are natural enough under the circumstances, but you—— I could scarcely hope that you would feel them either acceptable or satisfactory."

There was a curious cadence in his voice which matched the strangeness of his glance. It sounded like shame mingled with contrition, and even tinged with recklessness. As the flush of discomfiture faded from his face I noted that it left his countenance sadly white and drawn. Plainly he was most miserably out of sorts, and the effort of sustaining a conversation upon the simplest topics proved to be beyond his powers. Our residences lay not far apart, and we got out at the same station, he accompanying me courteously to my door. As we walked along side by side his mood of dejection and gloom made so powerful an impression upon me that I was urged by a strong movement of solicitude to extend a helping hand to him, feeling that the moral effect of my good will might be of some value to him even if practical cooperation were denied me.

I shall never forget the look he turned upon me when, somewhat hesitatingly but with great earnestness, I touched upon his apparent trouble and made the proffer of my sympathy, and even of my help and assistance, if such could avail. A woman is not always mistress of her intonations. I had not meant that mine should convey a more intimate degree of concern than I would exhibit toward any acquaintance, but I knew, even as I made the effort to control it, that my voice demonstrated a subtle tenderness and compassion which no merely casual friendliness could have inspired.

"No," he answered slowly, dropping his miserable eyes, from their swift inspection of my face, to the ground, and drawing his under lip sternly in between his teeth, "a woman's help cannot avail in a case like mine, and her sympathy—your sympathy—— May God prevent my becoming quite such a hound as to take advantage of that."

We had reached my doorstep. I held out my hand with a gesture full of meaning.

"Mr. Newbold," said I, "I have no right to trouble you further with my inquiries, and I do not wish to seem persistent. But a woman's help is not always to be despised. We sometimes——" I hesitated. I was treading on delicate ground, as I knew, and it behooved me to move discreetly—"are complete mistresses of our properties; frequently we have funds lying idle; we often are in search of good investments, and, tradition to the contrary notwithstanding, occasionally we are capable of keeping our own counsels. I know that there are times when temporary loans——"

He broke in upon me with almost violent deprecation.

"Don't, Mrs. Allaire! Don't, I beg of you!" he cried, his face grown white and working strangely, his eyes full of passionate self-upbraiding, "not that! If you only knew! When you learn——" He stopped short, and for an instant looked me full in the face, then turned on his heel. "Good-by," he said huskily; "good-by. I shall not ask you to think kindly of me if we do not meet again. That, perhaps, would be too much to expect. But I will ask you, for the sake of a man who has done his level best and failed, to think as well of me as you can."

I ascended to my chamber to lay aside my street gown, with my mind brooding upon Schuyler Newbold and the mystery of his manner and conversation. I submitted myself to the hands of my maid in silence, which was respected by her until a sharp exclamation on my part drew a "Plait-il, madame?" from her lips.

"My purse!" I cried, having plunged my hand into my pocket in search of that article, only to find it gone. "It has been stolen, Julie, and with it five hundred dollars that I drew this afternoon from the bank. But—why, what is this, Julie? Look here!"

Mistress and maid, two curious and excited women, leveled to the same rank by a common impulse, held to be the dominant characteristic of our sex, we bent our heads together over the object which, in lieu of my purse, I had drawn from my pocket—a large, massive gold band, into which was sunk a huge, and apparently magnificent sapphire.

"Mais, madame, c'est la bague d'un monsieur!" exclaimed Julie. "Vraiment, c'est la bague d'un géant!"

"And how, in the name of all that is mysterious, came it in my pocket, Julie?" I cried, gazing at it in stupefaction. "It must have slipped from the finger of the scoundrel who robbed me. Stolen by him, I suppose, from some one else."

Julie at once approved my penetration.

"C'est bien ça, madame," she coincided, with a duck of her sleek head.

I must confess that, notwithstanding my interest in Schuyler Newbold and his unhappy circumstances, my own fortunes or misfortunes—as one chooses to consider an event which enriched while it preyed upon me—engrossed a fair share of my thoughts that night, and early in the morning I dispatched my companion, Mrs Eels, to the police station to report my loss and enter a description of the article substituted in its place, while, urged by curiosity as to its value, I myself took the ring to my jewelers to have its worth appraised. I offered no remarks concerning it beyond stating that I desired an estimate of the value of the stone.

The expert to whom I applied, and to whom I was well known, smiled as he took the ring from me.

"You ladies," he said, weighing the bauble lightly in his hand and making no offer to examine it, "are curiously skeptical, I find, in the matter of second-hand jewelry. You are rarely content to accept our certificates without oral confirmation."

"I had no certificate with this," I replied. "Indeed, I was not aware that such were ever issued. I have never received one with a purchase. Did this ring come from here?"

"Yes," he answered. "It is an exceedingly rare stone—a registered gem. With such we always deliver a voucher. When I sold it to Mr. Henry W. Thornton two years ago I gave him a memorandum of its market value at that time and of its number on our books. He had the misfortune to lose the voucher, and yesterday, when Mr. Newbold, to whom he sold it——"

"Mr. Newbold!" I ejaculated in an almost frightened voice.

"Mr. Schuyler Newbold," the man affirmed, regarding me curiously. "You had it from him, I suppose? I inferred from what he said that it was his intention to raise money on it, but I imagined that it was only a matter of temporary embarrassment. I had no idea of anything serious. The failure——"

"Failure!" I cried, interrupting him again.

"You had not heard?" he asked. "Yes, Newbold & Jameson have been obliged to assign, I regret to say. One of our boys has just brought in the news from the bulletin boards, and worse still——" his voice dropped to a graver key, "there are rumors that Mr. Newbold has absconded."

I pondered upon the matter throughout the rest of the day and late into the night, coming to one conclusion, at least, capable of being acted upon. However it had come into my possession, the ring was not mine, but Schuyler Newbold's. Even if intentionally bestowed upon me in exchange for the contents of my purse, its value was so in excess of the amount I had lost that for me to retain it in the face of my knowledge of its ownership would be usury, even dishonesty. I felt it absolutely necessary that I communicate with the man to whom it belonged.

And so, on the following morning, I took a cab and drove to the offices of Newbold & Jameson, whose failure I had heard confirmed. The junior partner received me courteously, although somewhat under protest, as I could perceive. I asked for Mr. Newbold. Mr. Newbold, he replied, with a tinge of rising color reddening his florid skin, was out of town. I then requested his address. The flush upon his cheeks deepened. It would be useless, he said, to give it to me, as his partner was expected to return almost immediately. It was doubtful if he would receive any communication forwarded to him. Suddenly I recalled the hitherto unheeded remark which had terminated the information that the jeweler had imparted to me. There were rumors, he had said, that Mr. Newbold had absconded. Preoccupied with the newly discovered fact of his apparently well-established guilt toward myself, I had lost sight of the hint of a larger criminality toward the public. I daresay there was a new significance in the look I upraised to Mr. Jameson, for his eyes fell before it.

"I SAW SCHUYLER NEWBOLD LYING THERE"

"It is absolutely necessary that I communicate with Mr. Newbold," I insisted. "It is for his own sake that I ask his address. You need have no fear in giving it to me. I shall"—I spoke with pointed deliberation—"I shall impart it to no one else."

Mr. Jameson's face became crimson, and a resentful glitter came into his eyes. I had produced a visible effect, but without result. He simply persisted in declining to give me the needed information on the ground of his partner's immediate return, and advised me to send whatever communication I had for Mr. Newbold to his office, promising that it should be delivered to him at the earliest possible moment.

Perceiving that further solicitation was useless, I then had recourse to a bit of feminine strategy. While we had been conversing I had surreptitiously removed the glove from my left hand. This, under pretense of using my handkerchief, I now withdrew from my muff, bringing the sapphire ring, which was with difficulty held in place upon the third finger by means of a guard, directly beneath my companion's observation. I saw him start and look searchingly at me. His color changed, his manner grew confused, he became visibly embarrassed, and after a moment's hesitation broke forth into apologies.

I smiled consciously, and murmured some conventional phrase calculated to set him at ease.

"But I had no idea, you know," he stammered contritely. "Mrs. Allaire," he went on, in a pained and mortified voice, glancing around as if to assure himself that there were no eavesdroppers thereabouts, "I do not tell you Newbold's address because I cannot. I do not know it myself."

"Then," I burst forth harshly, "what they say of him is true! He has ab——"

He interrupted me with an angry exclamation.

"It is false!" he exclaimed. "Something has happened to him. I don't know what; but not that. No honester man lives to-day than Schuyler Newbold."

I returned home. Several days passed, bringing no tidings of the missing man. The reports of his defalcation strengthened. He had been the financial man of the concern, and had borrowed considerable sums of money on his personal credit, hoping, doubtless, to tide over a crisis caused by the failure of two or three large firms which had been heavily indebted to his house. Two of the largest of these notes had fallen due upon the day when I had met him, the day which likewise proved to be the date of his disappearance, and, as they had been once or twice renewed, the holders had declined to extend them further.

Mr. Jameson's position was most uncomfortable. His attempt to shield his partner's mysterious conduct by assuming to possess information of his whereabouts naturally was obliged to yield, with the passage of time and the importunities of his creditors, to a frank acknowledgment of his ignorance. A man who criminally turns to his own advantage the good faith of his friends can hardly hope to retain the respect of the community, particularly when he evades even the pretense of self-justification. Scarcely three days passed after the date of the assignment before Schuyler Newbold's name had become a term of reproach, his reputation a torn and tattered ensign. On the fourth day, however, before any statement had been made by the assignees, some one took over the worthless notes, and at the same time a considerable block of a certain excellent, dividend-paying stock was placed on the market. Singularly enough, the transaction was made through my lawyer, acting for some client who wished to remain unknown.

This evidence of confidence in the absent bankrupt had some effect, I rejoice to say, on public sentiment. People began to remark that if Newbold's private obligations had been met, however mysteriously, it might be as well to suspend judgment until events should either confirm the appearance of guilt in his flight, or he should himself appear to explain it. Furthermore, the statement of the assignees, published upon the following day, proved far more satisfactory than people had anticipated. The failure was by no means a bad one, and it was quite possible that affairs might be so readjusted as to allow the house to continue business. Meanwhile, where was Schuyler Newbold? That was the question which everybody was asking. On the very day of the publication of the assignees' statement I set about resuming my usual routine of life, which had been sadly interrupted by anxiety over the affair. Among the duties which ordinarily engaged me was that of hospital visiting, and upon that day, immediately after luncheon, I set out for the B—— Street Hospital, where I was a frequent visitor.

I happened to run directly upon Doctor Elliott, the house surgeon, upon entering the place, who hailed me with acclaim, and conducted me to his office, saying that he had been looking for me for several days.

"I have something here," he said, "which I think may belong to you. At least, your card is in it. Look! Do you recognize this?" He handed me an object which I greeted with a cry of surprise.

"My purse! Doctor Elliott, where did you get it?"

"From a patient who was brought into the hospital some days ago, and who has been in an unconscious state almost ever since, unable to identify himself."

I asked for a description of the man. The Doctor gave it so graphically that I could not doubt to whom it applied.

My heart sank a moment at finding my conclusions as to my pickpocket's identity thus confirmed. A moment later it leaped with relief at the suggestion that Schuyler Newbold's presence in the hospital was itself an extenuating circumstance—that he had acted under conditions of physical derangement which must acquit him of moral responsibility.

I turned to Doctor Elliott. "I think I know your patient," I said. "He is a friend of mine. He is Schuyler Newbold, of the firm of Newbold & Jameson. You may have heard of their suspension, and of his mysterious disappearance. On what day did he fall ill?"

The Doctor consulted his book. "He was admitted on Thursday afternoon, late," he announced.

"Ah!" I cried exultantly, for it had been on that day that we had ridden home together, and I rejoiced at finding how well my theory was being borne out by facts.

"But," the Doctor went on, "we can scarcely call it falling ill, my dear Mrs. Allaire. Mr. Newbold is not suffering from the result of natural causes, you know. I have scarcely ever examined a man who seemed to have been in a sounder condition than he previous to his accident. I thought I had told you that he was suffering from concussion of the brain due to a collision with an automobile on the corner here."

And so my house of cards fell in a heap to the ground! At the Doctor's invitation I visited the public ward where his patient was lying to make sure that my inference was correct. Ah! the tide of pity and tenderness that surged through my heart as I saw Schuyler Newbold lying there, helpless and unconscious!

As I returned through the corridor with Doctor Elliott I directed him to have Mr. Newbold removed to a private room at once, and to see to it that he had every comfort which the hospital could provide, saying that I would take it upon me to communicate with his friends, and that until they should come forward the sum of money which had been in my purse might be applied to the necessary expenses of the case. The Doctor looked at me with lifted brows.

"You forget, I think," he observed, "that when you delivered your purse into Mr. Newbold's keeping it was as empty as Lucy Locket's celebrated pocket."

"Oh, no," I cried impulsively, "you are mistaken, Doctor. I had a considerable amount in it: five hundred dollars in bills and a little Russian kopeck, a pocket-piece. If it was empty it must have been rifled by some one in the crowd."

Doctor Elliott shook his head.

"I think not," he said. "It so happened that I was passing at the time Mr. Newbold was run down. I was the first person to reach him, and I remained in close attendance until he was placed in the ambulance. Prior to that I had taken the precaution to search his pockets for any valuables that they might contain." The Doctor spoke somewhat severely. Apparently his suspicions were aroused.

A week passed, a week of miserable doubt and disquietude. And then one night I found myself compelled to fulfill an engagement long ago undertaken, to chaperon a small party at the apartments of a bachelor of my acquaintance. The resources in the way of entertainment were many, the chief diversion being a sleight-of-hand performance by a prestidigitateur lately come into fashion. The man's appearance was rather engaging, and his face seemed vaguely known to me, but locate him I could not.

He had done some really novel and extraordinary things which had been received with much applause by his audience, when he finally announced that he would conclude his efforts by transferring, without apparent means, a small coin which he held up for inspection, from his own position upon the platform to any receptacle in the room which might be agreed upon without his knowledge; that he would not remove the article thence himself, but would allow any one selected by the audience to do so.

I, sitting at some distance from him, could not very well distinguish the coin, but when, a few moments later, having been chosen to discover if the trick had succeeded, I opened the drawer of the little cigar cabinet in which it was to have been deposited according to the universal wish, I could not restrain a cry, for there lay my little Russian kopeck, mine unmistakably by virtue of certain tiny distinguishing marks which the donor had caused to be engraved upon it under a microscope, and which appeared mere scratches to the naked eye. And as I beheld the coin I suddenly remembered where I had first seen this certainly remarkable trickster. As I had turned to confront Schuyler Newbold upon entering the car that memorable day this man's face had peered out at me for an instant over his shoulder.

My little outburst was naturally ascribed to surprise at the success of the trick, but when presently the prestidigitateur approached to claim his coin I withheld it, saying archly that I must retain it as a souvenir of so remarkable an occasion. To which the fellow, flattered by my interest, acceded.

It is scarcely necessary for me to continue my tale further. The most ordinary imagination can furnish from these data the explanation of the robbery and its accompanying substitution of ring for pocketbook. When taxed by my lawyer the juggler made no pretense of concealing the methods he had employed. All the circumstances had tended to make his task an easy one—the pressure of the crowd, the preoccupation of Schuyler Newbold, my own concentration of attention upon the difficult business of maintaining a foothold upon the platform.

"The ring was an unexpected find," the fellow declared. "I was about to nip his watch guard when I came upon it in monsieur's vest pocket. It was unlucky for me that monsieur's fingers are of a grander size than my own. So it was that it slipped into the pocket of madame when I sought for her purse. Why did I place the purse in monsieur's pocket after possessing myself of the contents?" He laughed. "It is ever better to let what you call incriminating evidence be found upon another than upon one's self."

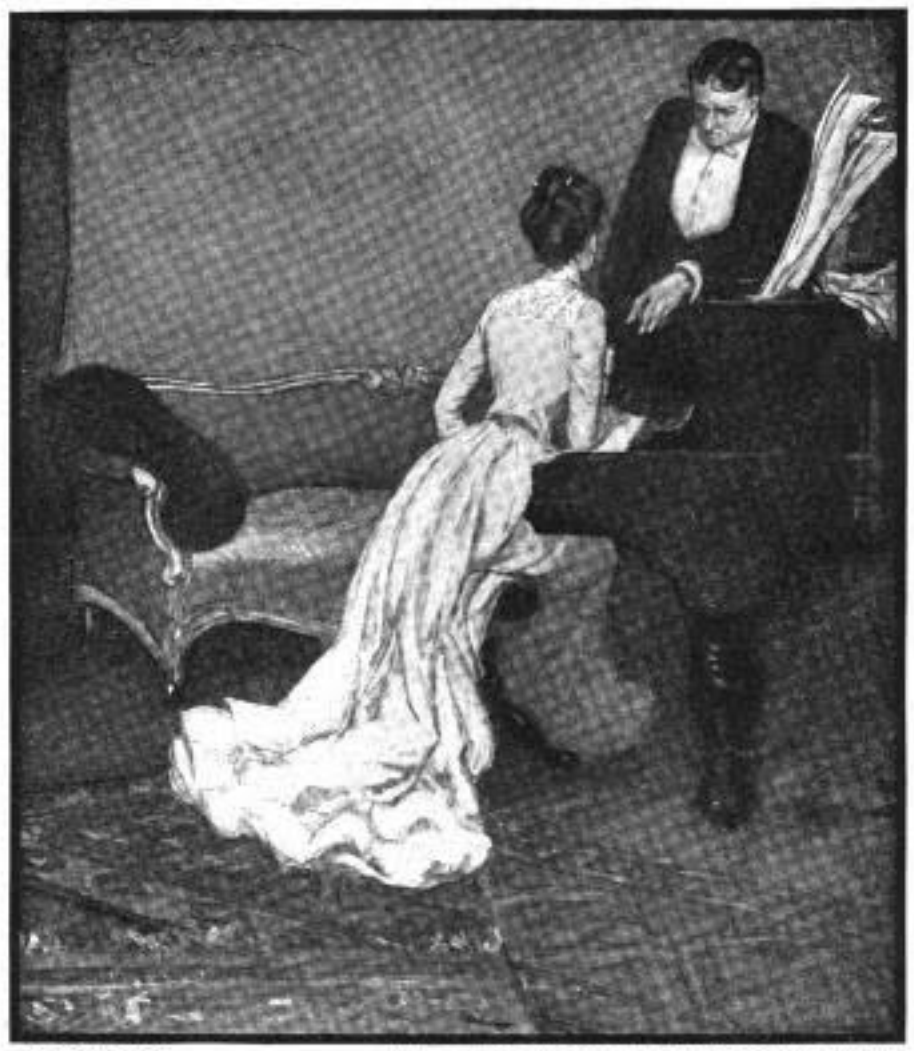
"But one thing I must know," I said to Schuyler one evening just before we were married, when we were talking over the affair. Ah, have I said nothing to indicate that we were married, do you say? Well, that is not properly incidental to this narrative, which was undertaken merely to show how easily an innocent man may fall under the suspicion of guilt, and so I have not dwelt upon it. "I must know for what reason you tried to escape me that day? And, moreover, why you neglected to take my hand at parting?"

He colored to the roots of his hair.

"Must I tell you, dear?" he deprecated.

"You must," I insisted firmly.



"You forgive me in advance?" he besought, still unmistakably reluctant. I smiled.

"Then," said he with a shamefaced manner, "it was for this. As I stood waiting behind you in that beastly crowd a diabolical suggestion occurred to me. I had loved you a long time. I felt that you even cared a little for me. Why, whispered expediency, don't you propose to her now? The announcement of your engagement to Oscar Allaire's widow would stand you in good stead. You see?"

I nodded, with tears in my eyes. "So," I remarked, "you fought and tried to run away?"

He nodded.

"Yes," said he, raising my hand to his lips, "but I lived to be conquered another day."

Indians at Paris

The Carlisle Indian School is to be represented at the Paris Exposition by its military band of fifty-five pieces. Not all of the members are Carlisle students, other Indian schools throughout the country having contributed their most talented players, so that the organization is, in fact, a representative body, and is designed to illustrate the effect of education on the savage. The band was trained by its present director, Dennison Wheelock, himself a full-blooded Oneida, born on the Wisconsin Agency and educated at Carlisle. Mr. Wheelock is a firm believer in the musical possibilities of his people, and is an enthusiast on the subject of a national school of music builded on original Indian themes. He has composed several orchestral pieces, aboriginal suites and native dances, which, rendered by the band under his leadership, are decidedly novel and interesting. The vocal interpolations, snatches of song and ecstatic cries are especially effective, and ought to give a grateful flip to the sated Parisian senses.

As an agent for the Government, employed in gathering children for the different schools, Mr. Wheelock has had opportunity to study the music of nearly every tribe in the United States and has collected a vast number of themes and motifs. He has found no tribe wholly destitute of musical expression, and there is a certain uniformity in the compositions of all the nations. A savage invariably sings to express his own emotions and not to excite or influence his auditors. An Indian love-song, for example, is never sung in the presence of the beloved. The swain does not disturb the slumbers of his prospective parents-in-law by moonlight serenades outside the young woman's tepee. He gives voice to his passionate numbers at a distance from the village, alone in the early dawn. How the knowledge of his tribute ever reaches the girl is not apparent.

The only woman accompanying the orchestra is Zitkala-Sa, who plays the violin and recites poems of Indian life. She is a Sioux from the Yankton Agency of South Dakota. She has shown a marked bent toward literature, in addition to her musical gifts, and articles from her pen on special phases of native life and character have attracted much attention. Her writings show a decidedly artistic temperament. Although an educated and highly civilized woman, she declines to be called by her English name, preferring to be known simply as Zitkala-Sa, the Redbird. She has a passionate love for her race.

Mr. Dolliver's Famous Hog Peroration

Jonathan P. Dolliver, of Iowa, of the Ways and Means Committee in the House of Representatives, is a son-in-law of D. K. Pearsons, the millionaire philanthropist of Chicago, and, in spite of his wealth, he has won an enviable place in Congress solely on his merits during his twelve years of service. Mr. Dolliver is an eloquent speaker, and when he is set down for a speech the visitors' gallery is sure to be filled. He is particularly apt at repartee and most members fight shy of a running debate with him. Mr. Dolliver is perhaps best known by his peroration on the question of admitting American pork into European markets.

"I hope the time will come," he said, "when the American hog with a curl of contentment in his tail and a smile of pleasure on his face may travel untrammeled through the markets of the world."

But that time has not yet arrived, in spite of Mr. Dolliver's eloquence.

Kate Masterson's First Poem

Kate Masterson, the poet and humorist, thus describes the beginning of her literary career:

"I was at school in Brooklyn when I first sent a poem to Judge, signing it Kittie K. It was accepted and published with an illustration, and my cup of joy was brimming. When I got a check for two dollars I effervesced. I then sent some verses to Puck, which was then edited by H. C. Bunner. They were also signed Kittie K, but were written from a masculine point of view, and as I wrote a very gentlemanly hand, Bunner evidently came to the conclusion that I was a boy. He sent me some very funny letters and I replied, keeping up the idea that I was a very fresh, slangy boy. He accepted the verses, She Stood on the Stair, and they were published in a Christmas number with a picture. As this was only the second poem I had sold in my life, you can imagine how wildly anxious I was to have it appear. I bothered Bunner with inquiries, for, of course, that was the only poem on earth to me just then. I recollect finally writing him, 'Do you think my poem will be published during my lifetime?'

"He wrote me: 'My dear boy, I cannot say if your poem will be published during your lifetime, as I do not know when you are going to die.'"

How Mr. Rogers Kept His Word

Mr. Henry Rogers, the Standard Oil magnate of New York, is the guardian angel of the little town of Fairhaven, Massachusetts. It was there he was born, and there as a boy he earned his first money carrying newspapers. To-day Fairhaven boasts of a library and a town hall—gifts outright from him—and on the principal street stands an ideal building, the Rogers School.

This structure is a fulfillment of a pledge made years ago, when Mr. Rogers was a small, serious-minded boy, who delighted to sit in the company of older people. It was in the grocery store one day that he ventured to remark that he thought Fairhaven ought to have a new school.

To those who listened a new school meant increased taxes.

"Wall," drawled out the spokesman, "I think so, too; why don't you build one? You might save up for a starter."

There was a chorus of "haw, haws," as the small boy slid off the top of the barrel to the floor and then drew himself up, his face red and burning. "I'll do it," he said, "and I'll give some of you people a chance to put the furniture in it when it's finished."

The episode ended there. The boy grew, went to Pennsylvania and thence to Brooklyn. One day it was announced that Mr. Rogers was going to build a school in Fairhaven. When it was almost finished he went back. On the main street he met the scoffer of his boyhood.

"I'm waiting for that furniture," he said.

The man laughed a little sheepishly, but said nothing.

"But never mind," Mr. Rogers went on, "I guess I'll put it in myself, but I want you to be on hand to see I have kept my word."

Pilkerton Won the Race

The first sub-contractor to begin work on the New York rapid-transit tunnel was James Pilkerton, known to most New Yorkers as a leading contractor, but still more widely known as the champion sculler of America for many years. Mr. Pilkerton has brought into his business the same pluck and force that kept him so long at the head of Yankee oarsmen. This pluck is neatly illustrated by a hitherto unpublished anecdote of a happening at one of the regattas of the National Association of American Oarsmen during the early nineties. Mr. Pilkerton was matched to row double against another team. He and his mate were the champions, and the general belief was that they would win without effort. But the night before the regatta public opinion suddenly and mysteriously changed. Mr. Pilkerton knew that this was not caused by any new development of strength in his opponents or any loss of skill on his own part. After making some quiet inquiries he discovered that there was talk of his rowing mate having been bought up by the other side and of an arrangement to throw the race.

He didn't say anything about his suspicions, but when the two men were seated in the shell and were well out into the deep water he leaned over to his mate and said:

"Look here, you blooming cut-throat. You've got to swim, drown, or win this race. You know me!" He was

Miss Heyer on Flower-Girls

Miss Grace Heyer, who has made such a pleasant impression as Babbie, the gypsy girl in The Little Minister, owes much of her success to having studied flower-girls all over the world. She finds that the Japanese and Hawaiians have the greatest love for buds and blossoms and, next to them, the people living on the shores of the Mediterranean. Flower-girls usually love music and dancing. The French and Italians, especially the Neapolitans, are clever in conversation and often quick at repartee. At Naples a pretty flower-girl sighed as she handed a bunch of glorious roses to her customer.

"Oh, Signorina, I hate to part with them. Each has a soul within its body!"

"Why part with them, then?"

"Because I must look after my own soul and body."

"In the Mohammedan countries and those like Greece where Islam exerts a strong influence, the flower-girls," says Miss Heyer, "are all boys and men. In China they are stalwart coolies. There flowers are marvelously cheap, a huge bouquet of two hundred blossoms costing but five cents."

General Wilson's Highest Achievement

One of the best-known men in Washington is General John M. Wilson, Chief of Engineers of the United States Army. Few officers have finer war records. He is a graduate of West Point in the class of 1860. He served throughout the war, and was promoted many times for gallantry and distinguished services. After the war he was for a time Superintendent of the Military Academy at West Point. It would take a column to tell all of the engineering work which he superintended, but it included the completion of the Washington Monument, and several of the important Government buildings in Washington. General Wilson's great ability was recognized a few years ago by Columbian University, which conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Laws.

Breaking All Records

The Fifty-sixth Congress is going to distance all the records in the history of the Government. Of the Congress that preceded it the same thing was said, which goes to show that each year the enormous development of the country is imposing larger and more multitudinous duties upon the national legislation. In the Fifty-fifth Congress there were 18,663 bills and joint results in both houses — 12,808 in the House and 5855 in the Senate. Of these only 1457 became laws. This, of course, is the total for the two sessions.

The present Congress has not yet finished its first session, and yet the total is already nearly 12,000 bills in the House, nearly 5000 in the Senate, and about 300 joint resolutions. At this rate the Fifty-sixth Congress bids fair to exceed a total of 25,000 bills and joint resolutions before it reaches the end of its term on March 4, 1901.

Some Troubles with New Members

Congress was interesting from the start. In the Senate there was a Republican majority of twenty. In the House there was a Republican majority of fifty-six. In every branch of the Government the Republican party was in control. On November 21, Vice-President Garret A. Hobart died. When Congress met on December 4, Honorable William P. Frye, of Maine, was chosen presiding officer of the Senate. The same day Honorable David B. Henderson, of Iowa, was elected Speaker of the House. Everything passed off smoothly in the House in the swearing in of the members until Utah was called. At the sound of the name Brigham H. Roberts, Mr. Tayler, of Ohio, arose and said: "I object to the swearing in of the Representative-elect from Utah, and to his taking his seat." A committee was appointed, and testimony was taken showing conclusively that Brigham H. Roberts was a polygamist and incompetent under the laws of the United States to be a member of Congress. The main question was the manner of getting rid of him, but the protest against him was so great that this difficulty counted little. The moral sense of the country was aroused and Roberts was overwhelmingly voted out.

It was well known that Mr. Clark had been elected to the Senate by the Montana Legislature after prodigal expenditures. Mr. Clark admitted that he had spent between $150,000 and $160,000 in his campaign, and there were other circumstances to show that this enormous sum was only part of the total, which has been variously estimated up to as high as $600,000 — with how much truth it is impossible accurately to determine. At any rate the committee reported unanimously that the seat occupied by Mr. Clark should be declared vacant. In the meanwhile Senator Quay, whom the Legislature of Pennsylvania had failed to elect, and who had received a certificate of appointment from the Governor of his State, was trying to get back into his old seat which he had occupied for eighteen years. The personal friendships which he had formed aided his cause greatly, and though he was going against all the precedents of the Senate, he was confident of success. The vote was one of the most exciting and one of the closest in the whole history of Congress. One vote would have admitted him, but it happened to be on the other side. These two cases gave a great impetus to the movement for the election of Senators by the direct vote of the people, and on April 13 the House of Representatives adopted a resolution for a Constitutional amendment providing for that change by the extraordinary vote of 230 to 15.

A New Brand of Freedom for Puerto Rico

One of the incidents that will last in American history was the treatment of Puerto Rico by the present Congress. Spain allowed the 800,000 people of this island free trade, manhood suffrage, sixteen full deputies and four senators to the Cortez at Madrid, and twelve representatives in the local municipal assemblies. President McKinley in his message to the Fifty-sixth Congress said: "Our plain duty is to abolish all custom tariffs between the United States and Puerto Rico and give her products free access to our markets." On January 8 last, General Davis, the Governor-General of Puerto Rico, appeared before a committee of the House of Representatives.

"With free trade with the United States will the people of Puerto Rico be able to work out their salvation?" asked Mr. Cannon, of Illinois.

"Quite able to support themselves," he replied, "and besides, to contribute much to the wealth of the United States whenever the island is put upon a sound basis."

Three weeks after this there was an unexpected change. A tariff was proposed, and then followed those well-remembered developments which ended in the driving through both houses of Congress of a new measure. Some of the more independent members, both of the House and the Senate, rebelled, but the party organization was too strong for the majority. The bill passed the Senate by a vote of 40 to 31. This measure puts over Puerto Rico a governor, gives the Puerto Ricans the smaller part of a legislative assembly and keeps in American hands the real authority. Even if this legislative assembly passes laws they must be subject to the revision of the Congress of the United States. Its judges are appointed by the President of the United States. It does not even allow Puerto Ricans to send a non-voting delegate to Congress, but creates a resident commissioner of Puerto Rico to represent the colony in Washington.

And in addition to all that it imposes a fifteen per cent. tariff on Puerto Rican trade.

The nation was humiliated and aroused to protest by this Puerto Rican incident. Almost the entire press of the country declared its opposition, and one of the extraordinary facts was that some of the staid scientific journals which never touched politics before in all their careers could not resist the temptation to express themselves. Almost every word that came from the pulpit or the rostrum outside of Congress was a protest against the violation of the given promise of the nation.

The argument for the bill was one of expediency — that it was better to raise the necessary revenues in this indirect way, and that in any event every penny would be devoted to Puerto Rico. Beyond all this was the broader fact that if the United States Government should give free trade to Puerto Rico it would have to do the same to the Philippines, and thus open the gates for the Eastern invasion of cheap products and cheap labor. But at the same time the fact remains to-day that the 800,000 Puerto Ricans, like the two million Americans one hundred and twenty-five years ago, are enjoying the privileges of taxation and pleasures without representation.

Money and Trusts

One act of Congress that will have a decided effect upon the coming Presidential campaign is the new financial law that placed the Government upon a gold basis. This will do more to keep business steady and to ward off the usual Presidential campaign panic than any other thing. No one seems seriously to think that it will be changed in spite of all the free silver talk, even if the Democrats should carry the fall elections, for the Senate is surely Republican for the next five years.

The Nicaragua Canal has had its usual experience. The pension laws are still unreformed. The reorganization of the army has been begun. More money has been appropriated for the navy than by any Congress in our history, the total being about $63,000,000. It was only a few years ago that Speaker Reed, in reply to the taunt that the appropriations by Congress would amount to a billion dollars, exclaimed, "This is a billion dollar country." We have now passed beyond that stage. We are rapidly nearing the point when instead of being a billion dollar country for two years we shall be spending a billion annually.

In one omission at least this Congress is more remarkable than in its various commissions. The whole country has been disturbed by the trust issue. President McKinley denounced it in his message. Every newspaper has debated it; every political convention has proclaimed against it in its platform. Both parties are committed to the capture and the taming of the monster, and yet absolutely nothing has been done by the Fifty-sixth Congress to halt or to hinder any corporation or combination.

Former Congressmen Who Settle Elsewhere

It has been announced that Senator Lindsay, whose term expires soon and who will be succeeded by the Honorable "Joe" Blackburn, will go to New York to practice law. It is another illustration of the many of how public life scatters people. There are, of course, many who cling to their districts; such a man as Mr. Cannon, for instance, whose life has been given to the public service, and who would feel out of politics somehow as a duck feels out of water, and who will probably remain in Congress all his days. Senator Depew will serve his term and enjoy the social and post-prandial experiences of Washington life, where he is one of the most interesting figures. But accidents happen and some of the famous men in politics find themselves unelected. It is then that many of them seek other fields for their abilities. For instance, ex-Secretary Carlisle is now in New York, where there could be summoned possibly a quorum of ex-Congressmen any day in the week. Former Senator Edmunds, of Vermont, lives in Philadelphia because the climate is better suited to his health, and thus the distribution goes on, and it is not surprising that Senator Lindsay should go to the metropolis where the rewards of law are larger, even though he did recently write an interesting article on the social attractions of Kentucky.

The salary of $5000 a year for Representatives and Senators, with $8000 for the Speaker and for the President of the Senate, scarcely covers the living expenses of a Congressman. The cost of living grows greater every year in Washington, and the average Congressman, unless he have private means, finds when he gets out of office that the bread-and-butter problem is very real. Of course the public life broadens a man, and he naturally seeks a larger field for his efforts.

MOBS, CYCLONES and ADVENTURES

From the Notes of W. C. Coup

Edited by Forrest Crissey

IN A LIFETIME spent with the circus I have learned the heart of the people. I have felt the pulse of the multitudes who have made the history of the West. This insight into conditions of things in the West brought me many and varied experiences, some of which were rough and severe. They had their interesting sides, however, and many of them are worth the telling, if for no other reason than to throw light upon the character of the people with whom we had to deal. That the show was appreciated by these frontiersmen there can be no doubt.

In the early days it was the custom to have a concert in a side tent before and after the regular performance in the circus. At one place where we stopped the people paid their money and went in and enjoyed the concert; but so well pleased were they that they insisted upon a repetition of the performance. At the point of their pistols they compelled the poor minstrels to continue their antics nearly all night, until ready to drop from sheer exhaustion.

Forcible Argument with a City Marshal

At one time, while in Texas, we were doing an act called An Indian Chase for a Wife, in which we used several guns with blank cartridges. The act opened with a lively fusilade and the reports brought a great crowd to the tent. The Texans appeared to come from every direction, many of them with revolvers ready cocked. The fact that many of them had been drinking greatly increased the perils of our situation. After careful consideration of these facts I decided not to give a night performance, and ordered an early supper so as to be able to load by daylight and, if possible, get out of town before nightfall. The seats were soon taken out and the side wall was dropped.

I sat in the cook tent, eating dinner, when a great crowd suddenly surrounded us. The leader, who claimed to be the town marshal, had his revolver pointed directly at my head, and I could see by the inflamed condition of his features that he, like the rest, had been drinking heavily. Realizing my danger, I knocked the pistol down and it went off between my feet. This was taken as the signal for a rush toward me, the crowd evidently thinking I had shot at the marshal. The noise attracted the concourse that had just left the circus and they drew up in line with revolvers cocked. A slaughter of showmen was clearly imminent.

I leaped upon a box and tried to pacify the infuriated Texans, while receiving, at the same time, their abuse. I was entirely ignorant of the cause of the disturbance and demanded to be informed of the reason of the uprising. Getting no reply, I appealed to them as law-abiding citizens, and for the first time in my life this appeal was useless.

By this time our entire force had collected, and as the show was the "First Hippodrome" and altogether the largest circus ever in the South, we had at least five hundred attachés, three hundred of whom were powerful fellows and well armed. This was the first time that I had ever thought of permitting my people to fight. Our gang was headed by my boss canvasman, "Put." I momentarily expected the attack, but just as I got down from the box a detective who was hired to travel with the show rushed upon the scene and yelled: "In the name of the United States Government, whose officer I am, I command peace!" It was surprising to see that crowd scatter, and certainly this was a masterstroke on the part of the detective. He earned more that day than I ever paid the agency for his services. In ten minutes all was calm and peaceful.

Breaking Camp Under a Hot Rifle Fire

In 1859 two Philadelphia friends of mine were going to make a trip South, and offered me big inducements to join them, which I accepted. We started from Philadelphia, making our way slowly through the different States, with the usual routine of wagon-show life. No event of importance occurred until we reached Missouri. It was a most foolish trip to undertake, for the people were then so embittered by the John Brown raid that we were in constant danger. First came a tirade of the fiercest abuse and this soon led into a regular knock-down fight, which speedily developed into a shooting-scrape lasting several hours. We were compelled to defend ourselves by every method at our command. Our men were marshaled inside the tent and armed with long, heavy stakes which looked like guns and were really formidable weapons. The wagons and other available goods were grouped in a circle, and behind this pioneer fortification the men paced with their long stakes at their shoulders like the guns of sentries. In the dim light thrown by the torches they certainly looked like armed men. So formidable was our appearance the enemy thought us armed with Winchesters. By putting on this bold front the canvasmen were able to get all the loose stuff into the wagons, leaving the tents standing until the last. Finally these also were taken down and loaded. Then came the most perilous undertaking of all. To get our horses from the stables seemed at first an absolute impossibility. It was the custom, at that time, to stable our horses wherever space could be found for them, and as Granby was only a small village, nearly every stable contained one or more of our horses. We divided the men into two gangs, one of which was left to guard the property on the grounds.

Our show was situated in the public square and was thus surrounded by houses and stores, all of which were filled with armed men. By the dim light we could see our enemies running from house to house with guns in their hands. The second detachment of our men was sent to gather in the scattered horses. And a lively time they had accomplishing that business! Shot after shot was fired at them while the horses were being driven into the corral. Fortunately, however, neither man nor horse was hit.

Ambushed and Shot at on the Road

We remained quiet until daylight, keeping constant guard, for we feared an attack at any moment; but toward daybreak we could see that the ranks of our enemy were thinning out. After careful deliberation I gave the order to march. Just as the first team was leaving the square the sharpshooters opened a vicious fire from the windows and doors of houses and stores. Practically every shot brought down a horse. Strange to say, we could not discover that a single man had been struck. Our men instantly fell into line and began firing together, but as we had only pistols the fight was against us. As our enemies were safely concealed in stores and buildings, only a few exposing themselves to our pistols, we fought at great odds. However, we kept up a rapid fusilade and under this heavy fire we managed to get out into the open country, leaving our dead horses on the village square. Once safely outside and beyond the range of the enemy we paused for roll-call and found that three of our men were dead. This put the spirit of fight into every man in the company and there was almost an eagerness to have another encounter.

Proceeding cautiously on our way, we came to a stream spanned by an old-fashioned bridge. The first chariot being a very heavy one, the bridge was carried down, throwing the wagon, horses, driver and men into the water twenty feet below. Soon firing was again heard and two more horses fell. This proved my suspicion that the beams had been cut for the purpose of wrecking us and of trapping us where we could be slaughtered. The next shots brought several of my brave men to the ground—dead in their tracks! The enemy, being in ambush, had us at great disadvantage; but my men were so thoroughly aroused and so fearless that we soon drove our assailants back. This last plucky onslaught won the day for us, although at sad cost.

After a delay of several hours, during which we repaired the bridge, we were again able to proceed on our way. Hardly were we fairly started when a new difficulty was encountered in the form of big trees felled across the roadway. This work had been cleverly done by the enemy in order to retard our progress, and we had to stop and remove these obstacles before we could pass. The time lost by the first attack, by the bridge engagement and subsequent delay threw us behind a whole day.

Although the people were all anxious to see our show they had not a friendly word for us. Frequently large crowds would force their way into the tents, pointing a cocked revolver at the doorkeeper's head. Finally, however, we managed to reach the Arkansas line with comparatively small loss of life. I am surprised that we were ever able to do so, because of the extreme bitterness which then prevailed toward all Northerners.

At length we came to a town called Bucksnort, the scene of the hanging described in one of Mr. Opie Read's short stories. Nearly every man at the tavern was ready for any kind of excitement. They started the quarrel by accusing our men of stealing their hats. A fight quickly ensued, and we were forced again to defend ourselves by resort to arms. At that time we were playing Mazeppa in which we used a number of dull swords. These were instantly placed in the hands of performers and canvasmen who knew how to wield them, and the result was a terrific hand-to-hand encounter in which we came off victorious.

At Lickskillet, another place on our line, the principal building was a log tavern. We put up our tents, but shortly afterward noticed several old men with long-bladed knives cutting slits in the canvas. The canvasmen, on seeing the tent walls slashed, vigorously protested. At once bullets began to fly from the corner of the tavern. One of our men was killed at the outset of this mêlée.

Previous to this episode our men had become pretty well discouraged and would gladly have had peace, but this last outrage seemed to arouse them to a perfect frenzy. Instead of shooting they went for the gang of roughs with clubs, stakes and every other kind of weapon they could find. The encounter was a terrific one. Our men knocked the desperadoes senseless and seized their guns, and in a very few minutes we were much better prepared to defend ourselves. I think during the battle our men seized fully thirty rifles. Shot-guns were seldom used in this section of the country. Most unexpectedly we succeeded in getting some recruits. A few Northern men who had come into the place to settle permanently offered their services for our protection.

The Studies of the Student to the Clown

In early days many of the young countrymen would be seized with a desire to become "actors," as they called the acrobats. This led the circus performers into the scheme of selling the ambitious wights something to make them limber. A big trade of this kind was carried on by selling an oil made from very cheap grease, the innocent victims being thoroughly convinced that they would come out full-fledged "actors" by the use of this lubricant. Frequently some young fellow would apply for the position of student to the clown. When he presented himself for tuition, the paint prepared for his make-up would be mixed with grease and thoroughly rubbed on his face and limbs. He would then be dressed in an old pair of tights and made to enter the ring, where he would be ordered by the ringmaster to "act up." He would be so embarrassed at this demand that he could not speak, whereupon the ringmaster would lay the whip upon his practically naked limbs, telling him that it was the only way by which to learn the acrobatic art.

Another trick was to toss the students to the clown in a strong blanket of canvas. I can now point to an ex-member of Congress who was thus tossed until sore and exhausted.

Among the various performances on our circus program, one feat was that of placing a large stone on a man's breast, as he lay on his back, and then striking the stone with a sledge-hammer so as to break the rock. The audience was invited to furnish a man to break this stone, and although one would naturally suppose that such an act would hurt the performer on whose breast the stone rested, he would, in fact, receive no shock whatever. But one day, while exhibiting at a small town, a drunken countryman, in attempting to break the stone with a sledge-hammer, missed his mark entirely, and the poor fellow received a blow that nearly killed him. He was obliged to lie in bed and have medical aid.

THE POLICE WERE CALLED OUT FROM EVERY ADJACENT STATION AS SOON AS IT BECAME KNOWN THAT A WHITE BEAR WAS LOOSE IN THE STREETS OF NEW YORK

The following day we were compelled to move on to the next town, as advertised, which was a keen rival of the village we were just leaving. Our principal actor being unable to perform, we came near being mobbed, for this rival town did not relish the idea that its competitor had witnessed features which it could not see. All our remonstrances were in vain; and we were finally compelled to allow the injured man to quit his bed and actually go through the performance. These rough countrymen would certainly have kept their word had we not complied with their wishes, and it would have fared very badly with us. However, the sick man went through his part as well as he could, and received the full approbation of the audience.

From this town we proceeded to a large Indian encampment. There we obtained permits from John Ross, Chief of the Cherokee Nation, and erected our tents. The Government had just made an Indian payment to this tribe, all the money being in twenty-dollar gold pieces. Neither the circus treasurer nor any one in the community could change these coins for money of smaller denomination and we were almost in despair. Meantime some of the Indians climbed into a tree, seated themselves comfortably in the branches, and prepared to witness the entire performance free of charge. This exasperated me, and, seizing an ax, I commenced hewing at the tree. Instantly I found myself the centre of an incipient riot, as there was a law in the Territory forbidding a white person to cut down a tree. John Ross, however, quickly came to my rescue and saved my scalp by an adroit appeal to his people.

We adopted the plan of admitting the Indians in squads, charging them a dollar each and taking a double-eagle from every twentieth man. The Indians seemed to enjoy the performance hugely, but were highly excited by the tricks of the magician, whom they regarded as a supernatural being.

Devotional Services Upset by a Demon

At a certain town in Missouri a laughable circumstance occurred. Here, for some time, a revival had been in progress. The revivalists had been abusing the circus, its surroundings and influences, and had tried to prevent us from exhibiting. However, we secured a lot adjoining the church and opened our doors. John Robinson, the chief proprietor of our show, was one of the best equestrians that ever lived, and at that time was introducing what he called his Demon Act. In this act he dressed and made up as nearly as possible like a demon. While riding his four horses at breakneck pace around the ring, he would utter a series of the most ferocious yells imaginable, at the same time working himself up to a great pitch of excitement, until, as the auditors frequently expressed it, he "looked like his Satanic Majesty himself."

On this occasion, at the close of his act, he jumped from his horses, ran out of the dressing-room and boldly entered the church, exclaiming in the stentorian voice for which he was famed: "I am victorious! I am victorious!" The effect was magical. The revivalist had been eloquently exhorting on the subject of the Prince of Darkness, and the overwrought congregation took but one glance at the theatrical Satan, and then, leaping madly through the windows and doors of the little church, broke for the woods.

At Council Bluffs, Iowa, we had exhibited to a large afternoon audience. The day was extremely hot and sultry, and in the evening, just as the people were seating themselves on the benches, a cyclone struck us without the slightest warning. In a twinkling the poles, seats and canvas were being hurled through the air in all directions. At that time we used an inflammable liquid for illuminating the tent, and this ignited and added the horror of fire to the scene.

The Wild Beasts Loose in the Big Crowd

In those days our menagerie was exhibited in the same tent used for our circus performance, the seats being arranged on one side and the animal cages on the other. Imagine the scene! Several thousand terrorized and screaming men, women and children rushed wildly in all directions, the combustible tents and paraphernalia were in flames, and above all could be heard the roar of the terror-stricken animals, beating madly against their iron bars. Two of the largest dens had been placed together and the partition bars withdrawn, so as to form one big cage, wherein the lions and tigers were exercised by their keepers. The fire burned the woodwork so that this double cage came apart and liberated the ferocious animals. These lions and tigers escaped among the people and added a new element to the general pandemonium of terror. Words cannot convey an adequate idea of that awful moment.

As the tents and cages slowly burned out, total darkness came upon us. In the excitement, one of the men in the audience happened to jump on a crouching lion and yelled that he was in the clutches of the beast; however, the animal was as thoroughly frightened as the man. Some of the animals were loose all night, and one Royal Bengal tiger disappeared altogether. No trace whatever was found of his remains when the débris was examined, and he probably escaped to the nearest woods.

Near to the tent was one of those prickly osage hedges, and into this hundreds of people ran, becoming so entangled in the thorny network that it was almost impossible for them to extricate themselves. Many were badly lacerated by the brambles. There was no sleep in Council Bluffs that night.

Several of our wagons disappeared and one carriage was never afterward found. Four or five horses were lifted and blown into a lot some distance from where they had been stabled. To add still further to the misery that prevailed, the catastrophe ended with a cloud-burst and the earth was fairly deluged, so that in a short time what little remained undestroyed by wind and flame was floating around in a sea of water. Dense darkness prevailed and nothing could be done till dawn. It was then found that the cyclone had done even more damage to the city than we had at first supposed. Though the circus was a complete wreck, it was learned that both the city and its suburbs had suffered severely, and it was considered providential that the performance had attracted so great a concourse of the people from their homes.

The Midnight Stampede of the Elephants

When we exhibited in Kansas, the country was in such a state of terror, resulting from the "border warfare," that all the towns and villages had organized military companies. At each camping place we were obliged to join these home guards, for protection. One day, while we were exhibiting at Lawrence, a detachment of militia encamped about a mile from us, the posts and guards surrounding the entire city. I had with me a friend from my old home at Delavan, Wisconsin. He was a merchant and had never seen any of the hardships of the camp or of circus life, and all this rough experience was new to him.

As we were obliged to travel through the country for weeks without daring to take off our clothes, I had a wagon snugly covered and this served as a sort of sleeping berth. In this wagon my friend and I spent our nights. At our feet slept a faithful watch dog. On this particular night we were sound asleep, when the dog made a sudden lunge, jumping upon us and instantly awakening us. The moon was hid behind a cloud, and it was, for the moment, very dark. As I jumped to my feet, I indistinctly saw what appeared to me to be a body of men coming toward us. I fired several shots from the big pistols I always carried swung from my belt; but still the mass came forward. I soon heard a most pitiful wail of grief, and I then discovered that I had shot into a herd of elephants which had stampeded.

The firing, together with the noise, alarmed the militia around the city, who, thinking the border ruffians were upon us, came to our assistance. It was some time before I could convince them of the real state of affairs, as the elephants had made a wild escape and consternation reigned. The militia hunted for the men who fired the guns, threatening dire vengeance for alarming the post, but after a full explanation we succeeded in pacifying them. Then we had a long chase after the stampeded elephants, which were finally captured.

A Polar Bear Hunt on Fifth Avenue

One of the most exciting and amusing episodes connected with my career as a showman is that which passed into Gotham history as "the bear hunt on Fifth Avenue." And certainly nothing could be more strange and picturesque than a hot chase after a ferocious polar bear along this aristocratic thoroughfare!

In 1873 there were no polar bears in America, and I thought it would be a good stroke of business to obtain some of these beautiful and imposing animals for my menagerie. Therefore I sent an expedition to the Arctic waters to capture a pair. My men finally succeeded in landing two enormous polars in New York. In the process of shifting them from the shipping-box one of these monsters made his escape, and started on a run down the middle of Fifth Avenue. His course was marked by general consternation. Children playing on the streets, seeing an immense white bear lumbering toward them at full speed, screamed and fled in every direction for shelter; horses, frightened at this unusual spectacle, became unmanageable and ran away; nurse-maids, wheeling their small charges, were stricken helpless with terror, and even the street dogs fled howling down the cross streets and into business houses. Everywhere disorder and terror reigned supreme; the streets became suddenly deserted, and one would have supposed that a plague had instantly depopulated the city. The police were called out from every adjacent station as soon as it became known that a white bear was loose in the streets of New York. The poor animal, unaccustomed to the strange medley of metropolitan civilization, was more frightened than those who fled before him.

Finally, by the aid of the police and some of the braver citizens, the beast was driven into a basement of a private residence, and there shot. Had the people only realized it, the creature could easily have been captured alive; but fear reigned in every heart, from the child to the policeman, and the latter would not consider anything save instant death to the bear. The animal was very valuable and had cost me a large sum of money, not only for its capture but also for its transportation, and I was exceedingly sorry to lose him in this way. I considered myself exceedingly fortunate, however, to escape as easily as I did, for had the bear done any harm I should have had to pay heavy damages. No person fortunate enough to witness the tumult of that exciting scene can ever forget the bear hunt on Fifth Avenue!

An Equine Officer of Artillery

At one time certain towns in Pennsylvania were greatly dreaded by all showmen, from the fact that the "tough" element there predominated, and rarely did a circus escape without a pitched battle with these desperadoes. Mahanoy City was one of the worst of these towns, and on my last visit there nothing but the sound "horse sense" of one of our trained animals saved the show from a conflict the result of which might have been deplorable. I had wired my agent, weeks before, to drop this town from the list, but he had written back that, under favorable circumstances, we were sure of taking about $10,000 there, and therefore, in accordance with my instructions, the town had been billed.

We had a fair afternoon's business, and at night, judging from the appearance of the house, we ought to have had at least $5000 in the treasury. But, as usual in that town, the toughs had simply forced their way in without paying, and, as a consequence, only about $800 had been taken. On the outside were several hundred hoodlums clamoring for a fight, and I am bound to say that "Old Put," our boss canvasman, and his faithful followers were anxious for the same means of satisfaction, and only refrained from an outbreak because they knew that instant dismissal from my employ would follow any attempt on their part to take the initiative in any trouble.

At last, however, a fight did come off, and a hot one it was, too! Right in the midst of it one of my horses, which had been trained to fire off a cannon from its back, got loose and, fully accoutred, galloped into the thick of the mêlée. The creature seized the strap which operated the trigger and began firing blank cartridges in every direction. If ever a mob of toughs was frightened it was then! They stopped not upon the order of their going, but fairly flew in all directions.

One of them afterward told a policeman that they could fight any gang of showmen that ever traveled, but when a horse commenced to unload on them with a cannon, he knew it was time to quit.

The School for Rogues

GIVEN a house of five stories, the fire-escapes zigzagging down its front and back, loaded with tubs, bedding, broken furniture and coal boxes, with no yard, with no view except of other houses like it, with a crowded, ill-kept street before it, with noise, darkness and miasmatic cooking inside, with few moments of privacy for any inmate, with a family for every two rooms, to say nothing of boarders, with a neighborhood of cheap shops and saloons, what manner of resident are we to look for? To the credit of human nature be it said that the resident is often superior to his environment; yet we are right in assuming that from this kind of house will issue more of the idle, the vicious, the weak, the diseased and the criminal than from those houses whose occupants have access to fresh air, whose horizon is not restricted to roofs and chimneys, whose chambers the sunlight enters, who know the wholesome color of green, whose sleep is not broken by chaffering and brawls, and who are not in constant temptation from gaming places and drinking dens. The tenement has become a problem, and its solution involves the well-being of millions.

The best solution would be abolition, but this appears impracticable, so we must at least modify. And the difficulty in reform arises not only from the greed or indifference of owners, but from the tenement populations themselves. They do not realize that their way of living is a menace to health or happiness or progress. It is the only way they have ever known. Their information as to cleaner, better homes is as meagre as is that of the comfortable class respecting the tenements.

But it is often necessary that we shall protect people against themselves. We must put gates at train and ferry stations, we must forbid smoking in powder magazines, we must prohibit unhealthful manufactures near towns, we must destroy unfit food, we must interfere in many ways with what at first thought appears to be human liberty, because we must consider the need of the majority. And so with the tenement. By reason of its crowding, its dirt, its lack of light and air, it is a danger. By reason of its associations it is a moral menace, not only to its residents, but to the whole community.

Imagine the effect of its life on children who are born in it. Never to see flowers or grass or running water, never to ramble in sun-warmed fields, never to rest the eyes on a view of hills, never to hear bird songs, never to know silence, never to have room for play; to see the night stars and the sunset only in glimpses through reek and dust, to live among those who are without ideals in morals and conduct, to be jostled from infancy to age: is it not horrible! Can we wonder that it is the tenement which is most largely and constantly represented in the almshouse, the hospital and the jail? That it is the tenement face we see on the loungers about the street corners and the groggeries? That it is the tenement dweller who looks out at us from the pages of the rogues' gallery?

The duties that fall to those who seek the betterment of the race comprise the urging of people to the country, the planting of better motives and higher thoughts in the minds of the dull masses that people the wearying miles of city barracks, the forwarding of schemes for limiting the ground space, height and number of tenements, for the widening of air shafts, for the restoration of yards, for the destruction of unsafe buildings, for the prohibition of crowding, for the enforcement of school laws, for the creation of libraries, parks and playgrounds—a sore need in these dismal precincts—for more diligent inspection by building and health authorities, for a police activity that will keep down the criminal element, for encouraging of the university settlement.

At its best the tenement is a sorrow. At its worst it is an abomination. If it cannot be abolished it must be improved.

Misspelling and Other Unpunished Crimes

WE HAVE a system of public education, provided by the State as its essential duty in fitting the citizen for life. We have also a system of public punishment, provided by the State as its essential duty in checking the citizen if he goes wrong in life.

This seems to cover both ends of the State's duty very fully, both in preparation and reprisal, and it should result in a high order of citizenship. We ought to see, under the public and compulsory education a steady rise in all necessary qualities of civic prosperity; and under the public and compulsory retribution a steady decrease of all civic sins.

Since we do not see these things in any such gratifying proportion, as might be expected, in spite of the beautiful dovetailing of public instruction and public punishment, we are led to scrutinize the twin systems more closely, and an astonishing fact reveals itself.

We publicly educate the citizen in lines for failure in which we do not punish him. We publicly punish the citizen for failure in lines for which we do not educate him.

This seems strange. At large public expense we train our children in grammar, arithmetic, geography and spelling. And yet, though palpably deficient in these branches thereafter, we have no legal punishment to follow. No man is arrested for misspelling, fined for a breach of grammar, or imprisoned because he forgot the capital city of Oklahoma. On the other hand, he is arrested for being drunk. Was he instructed as to the effects of alcohol and the legal consequences of intoxication? He is fined for beating his wife. Was there any class in social and family relation when he went to school? He is imprisoned for stealing. Was there a course in honesty in his curriculum?

Here the reader takes umbrage and cries that the Home and the Church teach these things—it is not the duty of the State. Very well—then why not let the Home and the Church punish such lapses?

And again, it is said that the punishment for failure in spelling and geography is inexorably found in personal life. Then why should not personal life teach spelling and geography? Why should the State teach those things for failure in which it does not punish, or punish for failure in things it does not teach?

Then it will be answered—proudly—that we in America have divorced Church and State, and will not reunite them. But this has nothing to do with the Church. Let the Church, let any number and variety of churches, teach such doctrines and dogmas as they believe; but let the State inculcate the practical duties of citizenship.

We enforce these duties, under penalty of the law, without regard to religion; why should we not give instruction in them without regard to religion? A simple digest of the principles of conduct under the law could be made for school use. It would do the children good, and might help to vitalize and to lift the law.

The Acrobat in Politics

WE MUST admire good humor, a blithe temper and a resilient imagination, even when they show forth in inferior men. What we call faithfulness does not always go beyond mere persistency of first impression in a simple and not very adaptable nature.

This seems to be more generally true of politicians than of any other class of men, especially politicians who pride themselves upon being always true to their party. The man typical of this class has an infallible digestion, thick blood, a mind which manifests itself by a jocund light in the face and a flamboyant style of conversation. He is a Republican, a Democrat, a Whig, a Tory, no matter what extreme changes of principle he is required to make year by year in order to fit himself to his place. He keeps his willing and alert eyes upon the signal station at party headquarters. Whatever the message is, he takes off his hat and cheers. Last year he was for a tariff, this year he is for free trade, next year he will be for anything and everything that his party may put into its platform.

It is wonderful to see this politician's unhesitating enthusiasm in behalf of what he lately condemned as "unpatriotic and in violation of time-honored principles." He is nimble at all times; but his agility is amazing when a complete turning inside-out of all his political raiment must be accomplished upon the shortest possible notice. Yet, when you hint to him that some or all of his party's early leaders were but men like ourselves, and might have erred here and there in dogmatically laying down political rules and regulations for all times and all generations, he bridles sturdily and laughs in your face.

Emerson shrewdly said: "Meek young men grow up in libraries, believing it their duty to accept the views which Cicero, which Locke, which Bacon have given, forgetful that Cicero, Locke and Bacon were only young men in libraries when they wrote these books." Yet, if you say to the politician, "Hamilton, Jefferson, Franklin and Madison were but men, a century or so gone by, and spoke for their own time and generation, not necessarily for ours," lo! what a revel of horror! You may even quote to him Jefferson's own words: "Can one generation bind another, all others, in succession forever? I think not. The Creator has made the earth for the living, not the dead;" but he only smiles and says, "Why, yes, that's so; I believe that," and the next day he is making a stump speech to prove that the present generation is firmly and unalterably bound by all that Thomas Jefferson ever said! Still a week, a month or a year later he will be quoting Hamilton, or Clay, or Webster to upset the whole theory. Meantime, his face has grown ruddier, his digestion better and his cheerfulness more magnetically apparent.

A war comes; he is in favor of whipping the whole world before breakfast; peace comes, and he condemns every man who went to the front. He clearly shows that the war was iniquitous and its results destructive of "those time-honored principles set forth," and so on. Or, if war has been avoided by successful diplomacy, he puts his ear to the ground for a hint of what his party is going to promulgate, and then up he leaps to denounce the cowardice of those in power who shrank from the glorious shock of patriotic battle, and sneaked away from the high responsibility of ordering the drums to beat, the trumpets to blare, the flag to wave, the fleet to sail and the army to march. Ah, but he is a fine fellow, this cheerful politician, and when he takes you by the hand and smiles into your eye, ten to one you feel his goodness and his greatness so plainly and so deeply that your vote goes into his vest pocket, and you are proud of yourself.

The Field-Days of Virtue

THE prevalence of vice in our large cities, and the apparent failure of so many reform movements, does not prove that vice is stronger than virtue, but is due rather to the fact that vice is ever at work, while virtue takes its vacations. The lawless element, including everything from the saloon that keeps open after hours and allows a crap game in its back room to the regular policy shop, is professionally bad. That is, it is bad as a part of its business. Its business will not prosper unless it can avoid the law. Its bread and butter depend upon preventing the law's operation. As a result it is active day and night, and its work prospers. But the reform forces are at work only now and then when some one calls attention to the fact that the city is lawless.

This does not mean that the reformers are not in earnest. They are thoroughly in earnest. It means that reform is not their business. The bad have few interests which are not concerned in the work of avoiding law. The reformers, on the other hand, have no business interests which are directly connected with reform. They are teaching, or preaching, or selling goods, and these occupations take their attention. Having no strong personal motive forcing them to activity, as have the representatives of lawlessness, they let matters go, taking it for granted that the laws are being enforced.

But suddenly some one raises a cry. The town has been captured by the "sporting" element. The town is "wide open." The good people are aroused and turn from their work to grapple with the enemy. Now we see a fair fight, for one side is as active as the other. We see that good is the stronger, for in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred the saloons are compelled to close on time, the pool-rooms are abolished and the gamblers driven out of town. But though we see here the strength of good we are soon to behold the weakness of present-day reform work. Seeing the town clean, the reformers go about their work again. They assume that now things have been started in the right direction they will continue so.

This is a strange conclusion. The reformers are most of them persons who have studied more or less both of books and life. They know that a comparatively small constant force will overcome a much greater power whose action is spasmodic. They know this, yet by one of those strange human inconsistencies which lead men to believe what they want to believe rather than what they know to be true they assume that the city will remain "reformed" forever.

But the bad are not idle for a moment. If they cannot be lawless their business is ruined. Their bread and butter depend upon their ability to get around the law. The minute the reformers relax their vigilance the bad element is busy again, doing everything in its power to control the officials and to destroy the results of the reform wave. In a few days evil is as rampant as ever. It will be some time, however, before the reformers will waken to this fact. When they do there will be another reform wave, another day of cleanliness for the city, another period of vice and then reform again.

And so the strife will go on; vice constant because it is the business of the bad; reform spasmodic because it is merely a side issue with the reformers. If reform ever comes to be permanently triumphant it will be in a day when the reformer's ideals are as strong a motive power as are the bad man's bread and butter; in a day when the reformer makes a business of upholding his ideals and works as constantly for reform as he would work for his living. Until then civic vice will continue to hold sway with only an occasional field day for civic virtue.

Americans in Paris

DR. MONCURE D. CONWAY, whose well-seasoned life of Thomas Paine gives as striking a picture as any of pre-revolutionary days, has just finished a French edition of his book. In rewriting his history in a foreign language, Doctor Conway has, of course, made profitable use of a bi-lingual secretary; but even under those favorable circumstances his task is one that few writers would care to face.

"The archives here are full of curious diplomatic and police reports on matters concerning the early days of the republic," said Doctor Conway the other afternoon, "and I have made a number of interesting discoveries, but, after all, the greatest historical 'find' I know of in recent years came to light in Boston. As you know, Boston is rich in historical documents. Among them is an old diary which was kept by a certain Judge Butler during the seventies of the last century. Historians know it well. It has been quoted and requoted, for it is a plain statement of facts, prepared by a man who knew the legal value of facts. In reading this over I came to the description of the battle of Lexington. You remember, of course, that the British are supposed to have fired first; for many years it was called not the battle, but the massacre of Lexington. Very well; this contemporary record states with circumstantial detail that the first provocation came from the American side. The Yankee soldiers had been ordered not to fire. There was one man, however, whose excitement ran away with him. He snapped his old flintlock. It flashed in the pan. But this flash of harmless powder called forth the English fire, and lit a war that lasted seven years and changed the history of our continent. In addition, had it been known at the time that the British fire was not unprovoked, there would have been no movement for separation from England. It was the 'massacre' that stirred up Paine and Franklin, and they were the two men who persuaded Washington to take a stand for a free America.

"There is room for thought in an incident of this kind," Doctor Conway added, "especially when it comes to light after a century and a quarter."

An Episode in the History of a Historian

Few historians have led so broad and full a life as Moncure Conway. He has been a clergyman, a soldier, a reformer, and always he has been the man-of-letters. When he was at the head of that famous "chapel" in London, the creed of which was purely ethical, he made it a rendezvous for all the writers and artists of the day. His theory that sound ethics and good literature go hand in hand needs emphasis.

"After the Exposition," said Doctor Conway, "I shall go back to America for good. When a man's hair begins to whiten he wants to be near his own people and in his own land. But I shall always think of Paris—we have known each other so many years, this bright city and I; and, after all, the atmosphere of Paris is good for a man to think in. It breeds thought. And, moreover, it breeds clear thinking. And then it is the mother of modern art."

Doctor Conway said these things as he stood balancing his teacup at one of Mrs. Spicer-Simson's receptions.

"And so I shall go to the 'Quat-z-Arts' ball," he added.

"Oh, Doctor," the ladies cried in chorus, "but it is at the Moulin Rouge!"

"So shall I be," said the Doctor.

"But I understood that the art students carry on awfully at these balls of theirs," one of the ladies said maliciously.

"So they do," said Doctor Conway. "They shout and dance and sing and amuse themselves just as witty and careless young men always have done, and, I trust, always will do. I want to take home that souvenir—a fragment of youth and art and Paris."

I have related this conversation because, had I not, scores of good Americans who danced at the students' ball the other night would never have known who was the tall, benevolent, old gentleman, dressed like a cavalier and cloaked and braided like a Spaniard. Some one should write the history of historians.

This Year's Salon Shorn of its Glories

The Salon is shorn of its glory this year. In the first place, it had to open a month earlier than usual in order to escape the danger of being snuffed out by the Exposition; then the only home it could find in this city of palaces was the tented field of the horse show—a dreary place, which is notable only because it is "near the Artesian Well." There are not half so many exhibits as last year, and, on the whole, the pictures are a bit under the average in quality. Many of the great painters, who usually show yards of space on the walls of the Salon, have reserved their new works for the larger galleries of the Exposition. The American painters in Paris have not received much encouragement to exhibit in the American section of the Exposition, so they have flocked to the Salon. And there they have won a very remarkable success. There is no exaggeration in saying that out of the best fifty pictures one half are by American painters. Of course, this is in the way of being a "record."

On "varnishing day" one gains admission chiefly by invitation, and is jostled by all the notabilities, from the President of the Republic to the latest famous model. Artists come and go, posing in front of their pictures, or tossing ejaculations up toward the ceiling, where their year's work is "skyed." The man who has his bust or portrait on exhibition flutters about this little candle of celebrity like a moth. It is a crowd at once pathetic and droll and fashionable. And this crowd, though the critics will not admit it, makes and unmakes reputations. This year it streamed away toward Hall VI, crowded around picture 1225, and conferred immortality upon a young man from Philadelphia of whom not one in a thousand had heard. Few could pronounce his name; the next day it was spelled wrong in all the newspapers—but fame had come. The painter is J. Lewis-Smith; the subject of his picture is the shore at Dinard, with carriages, strollers, the sea beyond and a steamship coming up. The first impression is a little dry and hard, for there is almost photographic precision in details. But, on second study, the picture grows tremendously on you. It has the surety and forthrightness that lovers of Manet know.

"Varnishing day" this new artist must have felt a little like Byron, who awoke and found himself famous. Probably the best of art is that such a thing can happen now and then.

The Burden of the White Man's Law on Art

As much as anything, though, I was interested by the Sons of the Men. It is always interesting. You have known So-and-So, a painter or a poet; you have loved his work; then of a sudden there comes up some one who signs himself "Son of" So-and-So, and you wonder and begin to feel that the generations are slipping by.

Here was Ridgway Knight's Quietude, quite in his old, best vein. A little farther on I saw a charming Canal in Holland, and I signaled it to the two young women in blue, who followed me meekly, waiting to know what they should not admire. Then I turned to the catalogue to trace out the author. I read: "Aston Louis Knight, born in United States, pupil of Jules Lefebvre and of his father."

Another son of a famous artist who has won success this year is Alpheus Cole, whose father's marvelous engravings have brought into almost every American home the masterpieces of the European galleries. Mr. Alpheus Cole has just turned twenty-one years of age, and in Dante Watching the Building of the Cathedral in Florence he has painted a very fine picture, though I do not think it is the type of his ultimate work. He would not talk about art that morning in the Salon, for the burden of the white man's law was heavy upon him.

"I was born in America," he explained sadly, "at least New Jersey is supposed to be there, but I have been living abroad so long that I shall have to return to the United States and remain a year, or lose my right to be treated as an American citizen. That is, the Government will tax my pictures as though they were the works of a foreigner. It seems hard, just when I am deep in my studies and my work."

It did seem hard; and in fact the laws erected by unwitting legislators for the protection of American artists need a good deal of revision. So long as the laws are aimed at keeping art works out of the country and preventing continuous study at the art centres abroad, we shall never get that national art of which we all dream fondly. You can raise literature in the loam of your own back garden, but art, as history makes pretty plain, has to be transplanted from the garden where it grows best. Then you may graft and train the original plant as you please. —VANCE THOMPSON.

LETTERS to the EDITOR

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

Opinions are like individuals—they are unlike. Many a man has departed life without leaving behind him one hundred cents, and still he was successful as a man, as a friend, as a companion and in good deeds. But speaking of financial success or the accumulation of dollars and cents, that end is more difficult to attain. Those whose sole desire is the getting of money, must have the advantage of one indifferent to hoarding.

Human facilities do not develop in the same direction; therefore men are unequal if given the same opportunities. There are a hundred and one different features that enter into this proposition of success, and one's time may as well be employed "thrashing the wind" as pointing out the pathway in life for any individual to attain financial success. I venture to say that education is the first principle of success in any walk of life. H. LEROY SPEERS.

Kalamazoo, Michigan.

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

Under the heading Mysteries there was published a few weeks ago the story of General Sam Houston's abandonment of the Governorship of Tennessee and taking up life among the Indians in Arkansas.

Several years ago, when living at Nashville, Tennessee, I was told this story by an old gentleman who was one of Houston's closest friends:

"Houston married in January, 1829, a very handsome and attractive young lady, a member of one of the best families in the State, residing at Gallatin, thirty miles north of Nashville. He was then Governor and a candidate for a second term. His real purpose in marrying her was to advance his political interests. The attentions his wife received exasperated Houston, who was of a morose, jealous disposition, and his domestic life was unhappy.

"One Saturday in April, 1829, I attended a barbecue with Houston, where he and his opponent, ex-Governor Carroll, both made speeches. I saw that the crowd was with him and told him so, to his great pleasure, and when we separated in the evening he was in the best of spirits. Monday morning I called to see him at the Nashville Inn, where he boarded, and was at first refused admittance, but finally the door was opened by his physician, Doctor Shelby. I found Houston lying on the bed with his face covered, and to my astonished inquiries Doctor Shelby replied that Mrs. Houston's father had come down from Gallatin the day before and that she had returned with him to her family, leaving her husband for good. Houston exclaimed, 'I'm a ruined man!'

"He said that he alone was to blame, that he had determined to exile himself among the Cherokee Indians, and that he wanted me to carry his resignation as Governor to the Secretary of State, which, after being urged, I consented to do. The next day Shelby and I went aboard a steamer with Houston, who was in disguise, and he went down the Cumberland."

In view of this narrative it is evident that it was a feeling of mortification at his wife's leaving him that caused Houston to abandon his high office and don the clothing and adopt the habits of an Indian.

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

One able writer alludes to the fact that there is no lack of ability among the young men—that it is devotion to the occupation that is most needed and is so sadly wanting in the average employee.

I agree with the hypothesis, but is it a fact that the majority of young men fail? I think not. So far as the production of wealth is concerned, the present generation is a phenomenal success. It is in the distribution of the wealth produced that failure is made. The average young man does not succeed in getting a fair share of what he produces, and as a result he is looked upon as a "failure."

In attempting to solve the question, our economic conditions should be considered. We find everywhere young men who are thoroughly absorbed by and devoted to the interests of their employers, and a trifling increase of salary is all they have to show for their care.

In many cases the young men who are discontented, who have never succeeded in entering the occupation of their choice, are the most alert to the true condition of affairs. They are the first to realize that there is something wrong, and make the best citizens when an opportunity comes to right the wrong. J. W. KERNAN.

Detroit, Michigan.

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

I was deeply interested in the letter of M. M. Reinar, and I think that although present social conditions are responsible for his position, the remedy is in his own hands. The principal factor in any young man's life is his spare time, and I believe an hour spent in playing cards will help a person in business as much as an hour of the sublimest thought.

We are a materialistic, utilitarian people with Kipling as poet laureate. And his story of Tomlinson—who was admitted to neither Heaven nor Hell because, although "he had heard and felt and read of things in a book," he had nothing to answer when asked "What ha' ye done"—represents the spirit of the age. Our business men want bookkeepers, stenographers, machinists, etc., but abstract thinkers they do not want. The business world has the money, and M. M. R. does not do it any good because he can appreciate Tennyson and Emerson. In fact, rather the reverse, for time and energy spent in psychological study must be taken from material works. If he would spend some of his time learning what would give the world material benefit, then he would get back material benefit. But for philosophy we pay little. "'Tis true 'tis pity, and pity 'tis 'tis true." C. J. FENNELL.

The Diary of a New Congressman's Wife

I AM much impressed with one thing here at the Capital concerning those who go to make up the smart world, and that is, that they take their pleasures very much as Daniel made his prayer, with their windows wide open. For the smallest as well as the greatest event seems always to have an appreciative audience, which, if not taking any actual part, looks on indulgently as though watching royalty at play. Goethe says that "nobody looks any longer at the rainbow which has lasted a quarter of an hour," but to my mind this wise comment cannot hold good, for the rainbow here in Washington has been in full view for a good deal more than a quarter of a year instead of a quarter of an hour, and every shade or flash of the prism still seems to be hailed with as keen a delight by the onlookers as it was in the beginning.

Page says that she fears I shall never rise to great heights socially, for I am not possessed of the genuine social instinct, else I would never tire, never see the flaws and never grumble; but I am so satiated and gorged with pleasures that, like the person some one tells of, I feel as though I had never worn anything but fringes or eaten anything but sauces. The keenest pleasure that I can picture to myself would be to have a crust of bread and be out on an arid plain somewhere with not a human being in sight. Robert says that if I had my crust and my arid plain I'd be scratching back again to civilization and society by the very shortest route. I am sure, though, that Robert does me rank injustice, for the other night, during the extraordinary festive performances at Corcoran House, I found that I took but a languid interest in the remarkable cake-walk, and could only smile feebly at the coon costumes and the pigeonwings with which the young people of the smart set marked the early hours of the night. I suppose my indifference was really ennui springing from satiety. I fully believe that ambition is not more reckless of human happiness than ennui.

In reality, Corcoran House is more worthy of notice than I had energy to bestow that night, for both past and present it seems to be possessed of a certain prestige over and above almost any other residence here at the Capital, and the entrée there, no matter who dispenses its hospitality, appears to stamp the individual with the hallmark of gentility, if not of smartness. At this cotillon and cake-walk this historic old mansion really seemed to take on something of dignity and grandeur of which not all the boisterous mirth of the young people could rob it.

Page says that until I have seen a real negro cake-walk I have never seen the genuine thing; that no matter how clever and agile these smart society people were, they were only an imitation with the essence of the whole thing left out. I will confess that I thought it, in all conscience, outré enough to satisfy anybody, and that it possessed quite as much "essence" as I cared for. And the gravity and earnestness with which the host of the house, Senator Depew, and the German Ambassador, aided by Senator Kean, acted as judges of the capers and pigeonwings, and finally awarded a huge white cake for the same, struck somewhat athwart my unsophisticated Spruce City notions of the eternal fitness of things. Later, when the cotillon was danced and I saw the nimbleness and lightsomeness with which our host led out the prettiest girl in the ballroom, I was impressed with the versatility and skill with which this statesman could lead either a Senatorial debate or a young woman through the intricacies of the german. It was a clear case of 'tis" not by the gray of the hair that one knows the age of the heart."

One of the really charming features of this ball was the old garden, lighted with tiny electric lights in red, white and blue, which threw out, in almost mystic beauty, great masses of flowering shrubs that were in their full glory of white and pink bloom. It was while wandering through this quaint old garden that I found my enjoyment of the occasion in the bits of historic gossip which came to my ears and which chimed in with the sights and sounds of revelry around me. It was here in days gone by that the wealth and wit of the Capital used to gather when Daniel Webster was in the zenith of his fame and used to dispense the hospitality of the mansion. Later, when Mr. Corcoran's great wealth had enlarged and beautified the house and had laid out this lovely, high-walled garden, the whole was thrown open in a famous ball which was given for no other purpose than to administer a snub to one woman in Washington, who in that day was the leader of the social world; and this ball and its snub have come down to this generation, along with the mansion and the garden, as a legacy. It was Admiral R—— who told me the story as we sauntered up and down the wide garden paths.

"You see, Mrs. Slocum, Mr. Corcoran was a great man in this part of the world and he was a power in money markets. He had come of very humble origin. His father had been a cobbler, and the early boyhood of the son had been spent in hard work and poverty, but the father was an ambitious man withal, and, making his way from one thing to another, became finally Mayor of Georgetown.

"It was while Mayor of Georgetown that he gave a ball to which the Washington smart world of that day was bidden, and the leader of that smart world was the brilliant Mrs. Gales, whose sway at the Capital here was powerful and prolonged. Well, Mrs. Gales went to the Mayor's ball and walked once up and down the rooms with her lorgnette raised to her eyes in supercilious fashion, when, all unconscious of the presence of the Mayor's son, she said to her companion with affected concern and loud enough for all to hear, 'Dear me! don't you smell shoemaker's wax?'

"Young Corcoran never forgot that speech. Some years later, when he was rich and powerful, he bought this old Webster house with this big old garden and made of it what you see it to-day. When everything was complete he threw it all open and gave the most magnificent ball which this Southern town had ever seen, and everybody was invited, everybody save one woman, and that woman was Mrs. Gales. Mrs. Gales, finding that she alone of all the important personages of the town was left out, swallowed her pride and sued for a card of invitation. Mr. Corcoran returned a polite note saying that he 'feared to invite Mrs. Gales lest she should be made ill by the smell of shoemaker's wax.'"

This story was far more entertaining to me than were the hilarious cake-walkers within the mansion. It gave my jaded interest quite a fillip and Corcoran House took on new attributes in my eyes. I led the Admiral on to tell me more. He continued:

"This whole square facing Lafayette Park used to be known, years ago, as the 'tragic square,' for public attention was called to it by the many appalling tragedies that occurred here. On the right-hand corner, over there, is the old Decatur house which Commodore Decatur built with prize-money, and it was from that house that he came forth on the morning he fought his duel with Barron, at Bladensburg, and it was to that house he was brought back to die when he fell in the duel, mortally wounded. It seemed to be almost an exemplification of the old saying, 'For all they that take the sword shall perish by the sword.' A little beyond the Decatur house is the Colfax house, where Schuyler Colfax lived during the brilliant days of his Speakership, and where he was later overtaken by a storm of political ruin which drove him mad. On this side of the square and only a few doors below here occurred under peculiar circumstances the suicide of a gracious woman. Down on the corner which forms now a part of the Arlington is the house where Charles Sumner lived when he was assaulted in the Senate chamber by Preston Brooks, and where he lay unconscious so long from his injuries. Across, diagonally, from the Sumner house is the old Madison house, where Dolly Madison lived for years after she left the White House. This is now the Cosmos Club. Farther along on that side is the Ogle Tayloe house, where Mark Hanna now lives, and directly next to him only within a few years stood the house of all others that was famous for its tragedies, and which up to the day it was torn down quite overshadowed the whole square with the gloom of its happenings.

"The first tragedy that I ever knew of in connection with that house happened in 1841, when I was a mere boy. Spencer, who was Secretary of War at that time, lived in the house, and his son, a midshipman in the navy, mutinied on board the man-of-war Somers and was hanged from the yardarm of the ship. A few years later two members of President Tyler's Cabinet, Upshur and Gilmer, were living in the house and they were both killed by the explosion of a gun on the Princeton while down the Potomac River on an excursion. And, by the way, Mrs. Slocum, Mr. Corcoran told me in this very house that he entertained the Princeton party here at luncheon before it started on its fatal jaunt. The luncheon, it seems, was set for fourteen, but one of the number failed to appear, so the party sat down thirteen at table. That night two of them, Upshur and Gilmer, were dead, and Mr. Corcoran, though scorning to be thought superstitious, admitted to me that he would never thereafter be one of thirteen at table."

The Admiral paused as I shivered, and said:

"Shall I stop?"

"No. Go on."

"A few years after this tragedy, Philip Barton Key was shot in front of this same house by General Sickles and was carried in there to die. Then, years afterward, Mr. Seward rented the house while he was Secretary of State, and it was there that the assassin Payne made his dastardly attempt on his life the night that Lincoln was assassinated. Then General Belknap, in Grant's time, nothing daunted, took this tragic house and his misfortunes began there, which culminated in one of the most appalling political scandals of the age. Then Secretary Blaine tried the house and lived there when he was Secretary of State, and we all know what dire misfortunes befell him——"

"Oh, stop! stop!" I cried.

"I only want to add that next to this tragedy-haunted place, all during the war, was the provost marshal's office whence men went either to their deaths or to political prisons."

"Don't tell me any more, I pray you!"

I felt as though a chill had swept over me in this enchanted garden, and I was just going to drag the Admiral back among the dancers when a whole troop of merry revelers came down the garden paths wearing quaint bonnets and taking quaint steps as they tripped a figure of the cotillon under the stars and the electric lights. They effectually dispelled the gloom which my plunge into the tragedies of the past had brought me.

Meantime, apart from social events, things political seem to hold the boards and I am much interested in the quiet struggle going on in Congress. This struggle is against that "bogie," legislation, for no man can foresee in this campaign year what dragons' teeth may be sown in a bill which may spring up and sprout into armed and hostile foes. Therefore the fewer the bills, the fewer the ills, is the motto of the steering committee. This steering committee of nine wise men may meet the same fate of the three wise men who went to sea in a bowl, and every one knows what that fate was. I was asking Senator P—— what he thought they would accomplish in the exercise of the staving-off process.

"Well, I don't know," he said. "The time is growing short between now and June 19, and before that time we ought to be off the hands of the President and out of the way. The committee is having parleys by night and by day to see what can be safely shelved."

"I saw a very amusing incident in the House the other day," I said. "I was in the diplomatic gallery. Both party whips were hard at work, and I was never more amused than by the sight of one poor man who had been trying to get shaved over in the Democratic barber-shop, and every time that he would get settled comfortably in the chair some one would go dancing in on him and bring him into the House, where his vote would be recorded, no matter what stage his tonsorial toilet was in. Once he popped in through the lobby door with his face covered with a pleasing lather and called out his vote in an apologetic tone. A little later, when there were several quick, successive votes, he stood within the doorway, the picture of misery, with his coat buttoned up to his chin, for of course he was collarless, until Mr. Hepburn finally had to give up because there was no quorum. It was one of the funniest side-shows I ever witnessed in my life."

And I went off into laughter at the memory, in which the Senator joined. Finally I asked, recovering my gravity:

"And what will you do with the Ship-subsidy bill?"

"There's the rub!" responded the Senator. "This bill must be staved off in spite of the determined fight Hanna is making in its behalf. I'm inclined to believe that the result of the Quay contest will help to settle its fate at this session. Wolcott amused us yesterday at our meeting of the steering committee by informing Mr. Hanna that it might not be wise of him to press the Subsidy bill in view of the fact that there were likely to be several Senators who would oppose it 'on Constitutional grounds.' When Wolcott quoted this phrase he looked slyly around at us in the most irresistibly funny way. Of course there was a laugh at Hanna at this thrust, but somehow the Senator from Ohio could not see the joke and his face remained as unsmiling as that of a sphinx."

"And that reminds me," I interrupted; "speaking of Mr. Hanna suggests the Honorable Timothy L. Woodruff, whom Mr. Hanna does not favor for second place on the ticket. I saw Mr. Woodruff at the Capitol yesterday and was surprised by his appearance. Why, he seems a mere chubby boy! I tried to fancy him presiding in the Senate, but somehow his round, chubby face, which the middle parting of his hair seems to divide into equal halves, would not lend itself to the picture of a Vice-President."

"Yes," returned the Senator, "Woodruff was at the Capitol all the afternoon. I met him and was rather pleasantly impressed with him. Young as he looks, he is in reality two or three years older than Roosevelt. He struck me as a solid, substantial, wide-awake citizen who was honest enough to admit that he was a candidate for Vice-President, and it seemed to me that his boom might grow to a very healthy realization."

"How would you like it?" I asked inquisitively.

"Well," said he with a twinkle, "I'm like the man who would not say that he did not believe in love at first sight, but he admitted that he did believe in taking a strong second look."

We both laughed, then I said reflectively: "Mr. Woodruff did not seem to bear any sign about him either of loud waistcoat or cravat which the newspapers have so harped on?"

"No," returned the Senator. "Some one ventured to chaff him yesterday about the stories in the newspapers concerning his waistcoats and cravats, and he laughed and said good-naturedly: 'For the life of me I cannot tell how the story ever got started that I had a penchant for loud waistcoats. My clothes are always conventional, and, so far as I am aware, there has never been anything multi-colored or vociferous about my neckwear even. Still, the waistcoat story must have its run, I suppose.'"

"How did he strike others at the Capitol?"

"He made a good impression in both the House and the Senate, and his visit to the Capitol has been of much benefit to him. He put in a busy afternoon with the politicians of all degrees and kinds."

"Is it true, Senator P——," asked I, suddenly remembering some political gossip I had overheard, "that there was an understanding between Mr. Hanna and Mr. Foraker that if the latter shouldered all the responsibility for the Puerto Rican bill in the Senate and got it through, a plank should be inserted in the Ohio platform specifically indorsing the bill and thereby protecting Mr. Foraker from any odium that might attach to him?"

"Oh, well," said the Senator uneasily, and shifting about in his chair, "it was said that there was something of that sort, but I——"

He did not finish. It was evident that Senator P—— would not commit himself. It was equally clear that he possessed some knowledge. I persisted:

"Well, the Ohio platform did not specifically indorse the bill; and Mr. Hanna did control the convention."

"Very true," said he grimly; then beginning to smile he said, "I hope you did not overlook, Mrs. Slocum, the amazing military feat which Hanna boasted in his speech at Columbus that the sons of Ohio would perform in the coming campaign?"

"What was that?" asked I, scenting something amusing.

"He promises that all the Republican sons of Ohio shall stand in a solid phalanx in the front rank of the fight, and as a phalanx of itself comprises a number of ranks of varied arrangement, you will see that the Senator's promised military feat threatens a revolution in tactics."

And the Senator chuckled greatly over it, and drawing out his pencil, said:

"A phalanx might take on an arrangement thus, or it might be of such proportion and shape as this."

And he drew queer things that looked like geometrical designs, and continued:

"But you see what a remarkable feat it would be for all the ranks to be in the front row."

As he put up his pencil he added dryly:

"However, Ohio is a most wonderful State. Perhaps her sons may manage it after all."

Saluting in the Navy

SOME one has estimated that it costs a million dollars a year to fire the military and naval salutes of the world demanded by international and service etiquette. All governments use an inferior grade of ammunition for the purpose, the United States, for instance, expending its condemned powder in this way, but with even this economical resort, the cost of the noisy salute is prodigious. It has been said that the roar of the saluting gun never ceases — that is, at some place, during every second of time, a salute is being fired. This furnishes an idea of the generous impulses which are demonstrated between nations or as marks of individual respect.

The saluting customs are most critically observed by those whose duty it is to carry them out. In the Army, the regulations are comparatively simple, but in the Navy, where our ships are constantly visiting foreign ports and are encountering new observances, the etiquette of saluting is quite formidable.

Usually on our ships of war rapid-fire guns of the three-pounder type are used for firing salutes. They make sufficient noise with the minimum expenditure of powder, and noise is the principal feature of the gun salute. When an American vessel is in a foreign port where there is also a distinguished naval officer of another government, the latter sends a formal note to the American officer advising him of the day and hour of his intended visit to pay his respects. The American officer calls his orderly and sends word to the first lieutenant, who, in turn, advises the ordnance officer. The latter sends for the gunner's mate and directs him to have everything in readiness for the regulation salute at the appointed hour. He sends also for the quartermaster and orders that the flag of the government of the visitor be made ready for proper display.

An hour before the time of the visit active preparations have been completed for the spectacular reception; the cartridges have been tried and several extra cartridges are laid aside. A careful watch is kept of the approach of the visitor, and when he is seen to have "shoved off" word is passed to the commanding officer and subordinate officers who are concerned in the demonstration. The visit is attended with much ceremony, including the calling out of the marine guard, if one be on board the ship. The visitor is escorted to the Captain's cabin and is entertained at the expense of the commanding officer. The call is usually of only a few moments' duration and, in most instances, is of a stiffly formal character, sometimes carried on with the aid of an interpreter.

It is when the visitor leaves the ship that the salute is fired and not until he is well free of the vessel. This custom is observed as a protection against disaster and is dictated by experience. Serious, and sometimes fatal, accidents have occurred to members of the visiting party by the discharge of a gun. Simultaneously with the firing of the gun, the flag of the ship's country and the flag of the visitor's country are displayed. They are hauled down together when the last gun salute has been fired.

Salutes vary in different countries, but, in view of the international exchange of courtesies, most nations have adopted the same number of guns for the various salutes — a sort of universal powder-value placed upon celebrations and dignitaries. The royal salute is generally twenty-one guns, excepting in the case of the Chinese Government, where three guns constitute that honor. Japan has adopted the European custom. Twenty-one guns are fired for all rulers, republican and monarchical, regardless of the extent, wealth or importance of the country. In answering salutes American ships usually return gun for gun, although our national salute is one gun for each State.

A custom adopted with serene bravado by our Revolutionary ancestors, which still survives, is that an American vessel, meeting a foreign ship, never dips its flag except in answer to such a courtesy from the stranger. It happens sometimes, especially when an American ship meets a Russian vessel, that this naval salutation is entirely omitted, although on board each ship the quartermaster stands at the halyards ready to dip the flag three times if the other ship takes the initiative. It is like two men meeting and passing without greeting, each waiting for the other to speak first.

One of the prettiest salutes is that of dipping the flag or bringing it half-way down the mast, holding it there a second and then running it to the top again. Merchant ships dip their flag but once. Pennants are never dipped, and are always displayed, day and night.

There are all sorts of rules which naval officers abroad faithfully observe in the matter of salutes. A certain number of guns is stipulated for officers of different grades, and the salutes include not only military and naval officials, but civil officers, royal personages and our own diplomatic representatives. The forts at the entrance of harbors are always saluted. Birthdays of foreign potentates are also honored when any of their vessels are in the presence of foreign nations.

Most of the rules for salutes have come down to us from olden times, their origin being matters of conjecture. One of the most fruitful topics of controversy in this respect is the reason for the practice of firing three volleys over a grave or in honor of the dead. The most plausible and most generally accepted notion in explanation of the custom is that it is a survival of the ancient practice of ringing a bell or sounding a gong three times, which stood for "Father, Son and Holy Ghost." When the bell-ringing stopped and ordnance was invented, the volley took the place of the stroke on the metal.

One of the regulations most strictly adhered to by all nations is that there shall be no gun salutes between sunset and sunrise. The reasons for this are obvious. The noise would naturally disturb inhabitants of neighboring towns, and under some conditions might operate to no good purpose. Attacks under cover of night and in the guise of salutes might be effected. One instance of the detrimental consequences of a violation of this custom was afforded in the port of Wei-Hei-Wi during the war between Japan and China. The appearance of a Japanese flagship at that port after dark was the occasion of a salute by a British naval officer who chanced to be there also. Incidentally the Chinese gained their first knowledge of the presence of the enemy by this nocturnal salute. There was a good deal of a diplomatic row over the affair, but it was explained away on the ground of individual carelessness; moreover, Japan found herself in the position of not being able to protest against what was alleged to be a tribute to her dignity and worth.

Army and Navy officers frequently discuss the usefulness of the gun salute. Most of them ridicule it and classify it with the traditional "tomfoolery" of apparel and formality which nearly all officers pretend to dislike. All of them, however, realize that it is impressive, and that "special full dress" and the display of flags and the salute from the guns add to the dignity of government. These accessories are quite as necessary in the conduct of nations for the preservation of international comity as are the courtesies between friends.

The idea of a gun salute probably has for its underlying motive the assurance of good will, as demonstrated by the discharge of a gun with all the racket and none of the danger of a gun loaded for active work. The same idea is conveyed in the salute of the sword, bringing it to a position which indicates that the holder has no desire to run the saluted through the body, or in the presenting of arms in such a manner as to show that they are not to be used to disadvantage, or in the raising of the hat, our every-day salutation, which may have come from the days when the helmet was removed to show the defenseless and peaceful attitude of its wearer.

Though naval salutes are costly, and though officers sometimes believe they are unnecessary and frequently ask that they be omitted, it is likely that they will continue as part of the courtesy of nations.

How to Buy a Horse

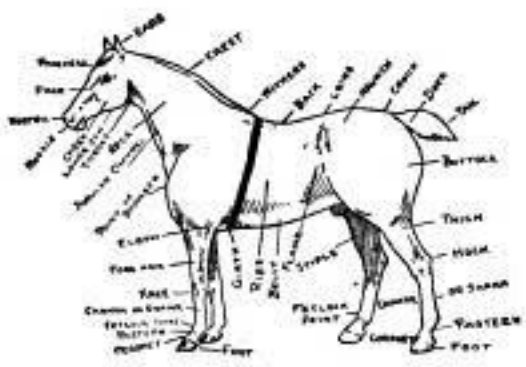
By A. H. Godfrey

IT IS WISE TO MAKE AN OFFER ON A SHOW HORSE BEFORE IT WINS A PRIZE

THERE is, perhaps, no commercial transaction upon which one can get more information gratis than the purchase of a horse. If all this gratuitous advice were reliable one might profit by it. Unfortunately most of it is misleading. Even one's personal friends are not always to be relied upon, and those who are well posted are generally averse to recommending a horse, for it is proverbial that the closest friendships are sometimes severed as a result of a horse-deal.

To the novice wholly unfamiliar with horses I would say: Either make your purchase from a person in whom you have confidence, or rely upon the services of a reputable veterinary surgeon, who, by virtue of constant observation and comparison of animals adapted to a variety of purposes, must necessarily be a fair judge of conformation, pace and action, and competent to give an authoritative opinion upon the soundness, constitution and temperament of a horse.

The Fellow Who Knows it All If, however, you know enough about a horse to keep one, you will prefer to use your own judgment to some extent in its selection rather than leave the matter wholly to a third person. If so, let me urge you to take heed of the old axiom, "A little knowledge is a dangerous thing." It applies to horse-dealing as to every other line of business. Knowing little to commence with, it will be wise to attend quietly several sales, public and private, and study the several types of horses offered. In this way, though you may not be gifted with an eye for proportion, and may lack the natural talent to comprehend, at a glance, all the good and bad points of a horse, you will soon learn to recognize the useful as distinguished from the merely ornamental animal. You will also quickly become convinced that it is much easier to find the "ordinary" horse fairly well trained to ride and drive and not actually vicious, than to procure, at a reasonable figure, a high-class horse likely to prove satisfactory in every respect. Thus you will gradually, but surely, lower your ideal and cease your search for the absolutely perfect animal. Soundness in horseflesh is a question of degree. Indeed, experienced horsemen are satisfied with animals declared to be "practically sound"—that is, able to perform their work without inconvenience to themselves or their owners, and with no apparent defect about them that would tend to lessen their value or detract from their appearance.



Half the battle is in knowing exactly the sort of horse that will best suit you, and what you intend to use it for.

What the Saddle Horse Should Be The horse chosen should be of slight or heavy build, according to the weight it has to carry. Height as the owner may desire. It should have a fine, intelligent head, eye expressive of gentleness and docility; a clean-cut, tapering neck, arched naturally, so as to permit of perfect "bridling," or easy guidance by the rein; withers high and clean-cut, so as to permit of a good resting place for the saddle; shoulders well muscled but devoid of fat, and set sloping well into back; ribs well sprung; loins well muscled, denoting strength; well-formed croup and dock set reasonably high; hind quarters lengthy; legs showing strong muscular development; cannon bones devoid of meat, flat rather than round; knees and hocks wide and free from defects; joints supple; pasterns long and elastic; feet sound and standing firmly the proper distance apart. The walk must be in perfect cadence, the canter easy, and the gallop showing plenty of scope.

If a horse is wanted for use in a light gig, phaeton or brougham, and with stylish rhythmical action, suitable for the park or for work on hard, smooth pavements in crowded thoroughfares, you will naturally select one of stout, blocky conformation, showing sufficient breeding to insure an energetic movement, and at the same time bulky enough to admit of its weight enabling the animal to pull a carriage without apparent effort. A horse of the true hackney stamp about fills this bill. For use on country roads, where speed rather than excessive style is required, the trotting-bred horse is, of course, preferable. But whatever class of horse is chosen for fine work in a carriage, it should have been trained exclusively for that purpose, and not for the saddle.

What the Harness Horse Should Be The walk and trot must be its best gaits, as galloping will seldom be required. As heavy harness covers many small defects of shape, the head may be a little plainer than that of the saddle horse, the withers not so high and fine, and the shoulder not so oblique. The legs and pasterns may be shorter and stouter than those of the fine saddle hack, and powerful rather than elastic. The horse should possess rounder conformation throughout so as to fill harness, but in all other respects should partake of the good qualities of the finished hack, particularly as to depth through the heart, ribbing, loins, etc. Fine action is the sine qua non of a harness horse, and the legs and feet must move in a straight line and be lifted in regular cadence when looked at from the front or from the rear. The horse when at rest should have a stately demeanor.

Most beginners make the mistake of purchasing what is known as the "double-purpose" horse, and expect it to be satisfactory for riding and driving. As a matter of fact it can only be indifferent at either job. Much driving will lessen its value as a saddle horse, and frequent service under saddle will detract from its usefulness in carriage harness. The systems of training are totally different. The saddle horse is controlled by snaffle or double bridle and the pressure of a rider's legs and spurs, and balances itself upon its haunches. The carriage horse is driven in heavy curb bits, is urged by the whip, and, being accustomed to bear its weight upon the collar, balances itself upon its shoulders. There is, however, a great demand at the present time for "double-purpose" horses, and the market is well stocked with animals above the average in quality that are pleasant to ride and make serviceable drivers, and, indeed, will catch the judge's eye at a horse show, if he is not too exacting.

Useful horses may be purchased at many places and under a variety of circumstances. In auction rooms or sale exchanges where public sales are conducted daily or weekly by auctioneers, reputable or otherwise, according to the status of the concerns and the auspices under which the sales take place; at horse shows; at the establishments of horse dealers; from farmers and breeders; from persons who advertise in the newspapers; from personal friends or acquaintances. Each of these methods has its advantages and disadvantages, depending upon the buyer's experience and purpose.

Auctions, Guarantees and Precautions Horse exchanges of the first class are conducted according to strict business principles, are presided over by men well known in the highest social and commercial circles, and, having contracts with the great stock farms and influential firms that make it their business to collect and prepare for sale vast numbers of fine horses, it follows that these auction rooms are regarded as popular institutions and are well patronized. At these exchanges printed catalogues, setting forth the pedigrees and abilities of the horses offered and the warranty under which they are sold, are freely distributed.

Consignors to such sales usually advertise their horses as being on exhibition for trial and veterinary examination prior to the day of sale, the vendor's responsibility to cease the moment sale is effected, or otherwise according to published conditions. Horses offered "without reserve" become the property of the highest bidder the instant the auctioneer's hammer falls. In some cases, however, vendors reserve the right of making one bid, or of withdrawing a horse, should the highest price offered be considered too low.

Buyers at auction or elsewhere cannot be too careful as to the wording of a warranty. "Sound; quiet to ride, also to drive, single and double," as the case may be, is a form of guarantee that may be relied upon. "Has been ridden or driven" is indefinite, and may simply mean that a horse so described has been mounted for five minutes or less by a rough rider armed with sharp spurs and a club, or driven at a hair-raising pace by the side of an old exercise horse hitched to a cumbrous skeleton brake that it could not possibly injure.

To be sure of picking a fairly good horse in the open market, it is well to inspect an animal before it reaches the auction room, for it is necessary to judge of its age, size, weight, conformation, color and soundness, and get some idea as to how the horse acts in its stall and in and out of harness. If you wait until the horse is brought before the auctioneer, and rattled around the ring and up and down the street while a crowd of people look on, you will only be able to make a superficial inspection, must necessarily take in much at a glance and leave the rest to chance. It is often wise to bid up to a certain sum on a pair of horses, as one very good animal is occasionally coupled to an indifferent one in order to sell the latter, in which case you obtain at least one fine specimen at something near its proper value.

The discarded horse can easily be disposed of later at a nominal figure. Do not hesitate to offer a fair equivalent for a good horse. Remember that it costs from $300 to $400 to raise to maturity and properly train any horse worth boasting about. Novices often let a really valuable animal slip for the sake of a few dollars, and are afterward astonished to find that some reputable dealer bid as much as $600, and from that to $1000, and secured the horse, he having standing offers at much higher figures from experienced amateurs, who very properly consider that a really good saddle hack, phaeton or brougham horse, likely to prove useful for from five to ten years, is easily worth $100 a year. Indeed, delivery companies rate few of their van horses at less than $200 a year. If you have the good fortune to pick up a bargain at $300 or less, you may consider that you have much to be thankful for.

Things Better Avoided In bidding it is as well to keep as inconspicuous as possible and, catching the auctioneer's eye, merely nod to him, and he will usually raise the bid at the rate he has been accepting—say five or ten dollars at a time. If you call to him in a loud voice you are very like to draw the attention of the crowd to yourself and afford unscrupulous persons a chance to "bid up" a horse. Reputable auctioneers will not knowingly take such "by bids," but they cannot always tell whether or not a bid is bona fide.

There are many advantages in buying a horse from a first-class dealer. The opportunity presented of a full trial is worth at least ten per cent. of the price paid; the warranty of soundness and freedom from stable tricks and vices can be properly demonstrated; finally, many dealers exchange horses until the customer is satisfied. This, of course, in many cases necessitates additional cost, and several exchanges may prove very expensive. You can, however, take all the time you need at a dealer's stable. You may examine a dozen or more horses in their stalls, and note how they are tied, their stable manners, etc. As they stand in a row you can compare their hind quarters. Then, as the horse selected is brought out for critical inspection, you will note how it backs and turns, leads to halter, etc. Never stand with your back to a wall near a stable door. Candidates for sale are usually touched with a whip as they leave the stable, and are apt to resent it by kicking up their heels just as they emerge.

Points to Note in Selecting Your Horse

Let the horse to be examined stand naturally on level ground, and not stretched out as is customary, in order to make the horse's shoulder appear oblique and its croup horizontal.

SALE HORSES NEVER LOOK BETTER THAN WHEN STOOD OUT ON HIGH GROUND IN A DEALER'S YARD

Take in the horse's outline and then note the harmony of the parts—fore quarter, middle piece and hind quarter. Compare the height, length, size and bulk of the animal.

If the impression conveyed is favorable, proceed to a closer and more minute inspection of the parts. Examine the mouth, teeth and bony structure of the head to ascertain the age. Note the alertness of the ears and examine the eyes for blindness by moving the fingers near them to cause winking. Compress the throat to induce cough and thus try the breathing. Note condition of jugular channel or furrow. Press between the ears for poll evil. Note muscular development of neck, and fine quality of withers by feeling with the fingers. The bodily condition of the horse at shoulders, along the ribs, on the flanks, loins, quarters, etc., should then be determined. Examine carefully, and compare the knees and hocks by feeling them for defects, also by viewing them from all points—side, back, front and obliquely. The same with the cannon bones and tendons, fetlocks, pasterns and feet, each of which should be felt and looked at critically.

The horse should be first walked, then trotted, and its action examined from front, rear and sides. On stopping, the horse's breathing should be carefully noted. Then let it be saddled or put into harness, as the case may be, note its manners while being dressed, and, lastly, test its abilities. A warranty or a veterinarian's certificate can then be called for and the price agreed upon.

Remember that sale horses are kept in the best possible condition, and never look better than when stood out on high ground in a dealer's yard, in front of a whitened wall. Dealers are usually masters of their art, and, aside from their eloquence, have a knack of presenting horses in astonishingly fine shape.

The Major Strategy of Bargaining

At a horse show the buyer has the advantage of inspecting at leisure the prize winners selected by the judges, and, moreover, can here compare, as nowhere else, a great number of horses which, inasmuch as they are entered for competition, may justly be regarded as above the average in quality. Saddle horses up to light, medium and heavy weight, and carrying men or women riders—amateur as well as professional, according to the several classes—can there be critically examined. Again, these horses and others can be seen in all kinds of harness, light and heavy, and shown singly, in pairs, tandem and four-in-hand, thus demonstrating their entire scope and purpose.

The tactics of judges and veterinary surgeons can be plainly noted, and not infrequently will exhibitors afford a prospective buyer an opportunity on the show grounds to ride or drive a horse which has caught his fancy. It is wise to make an offer on a show horse before it wins a prize, as afterward it may be held at too high a figure. On the other hand, bargains are often secured by waiting until a horse is beaten in the show ring, when, perhaps, the owner, in a fit of despondency, may dispose of it for a nominal sum.

Advertisements in the daily newspapers and sporting press offer many opportunities of purchase from private people who, for a variety of reasons, wish to dispose of their own or other people's horses. While many such advertisements are, of course, genuine and worth replying to, others are inserted by swindlers.

Such alluring statements as, for instance, "The property of a widow lady" or of a "gentleman going abroad—inquire at private stable," or "sold for no fault, but for the purpose of securing a good home for a perfect pet," "one month's free trial allowed," etc., are generally ignored by experienced horsemen. They do, however, appeal to conceited people, who, fancying they cannot be cheated, are always on the lookout for what they term bargains.

If the horses were such great bargains the coachmen or grooms who care for them would quickly advise the dealers, who are always open to reward any one who will inform them of the whereabouts of a really good horse. It is, of course, unnecessary to warn novices against purchasing advertised horses that may have been stolen.

Of the Ethics of Horse Dealing

Buying horses from farmers and breeders is, as a rule, perfectly satisfactory, in that pedigrees can be definitely ascertained and, for the most part, strong, healthy animals can be thus procured. The inclination is, however, to offer horses rather too young for immediate work, or that are imperfectly trained for city use, while perhaps being quiet and safe to drive or ride about country roads. Many breeders, however, regularly keep on hand horses fit for immediate service in town or country, and these horses will generally be found perfectly gentled and under control.

Purchasing a horse from a friend is a questionable practice at best, and, on general principles, one not to be commended. Every man, without regard to his social standing, endeavors to present his horses in good, if somewhat fictitious, shape, and even the most conscientious do not, as a rule, dwell upon the defects of their own horses.

Indeed it is common belief that a man may be honest in everything except the transfer of a horse. Even the clergy are not exempt, and the eccentric Bishop Wilson, of Calcutta, who was noted for his racy sermons, attested it on one occasion when he was preaching against dishonesty in horse dealing. Pointing to the occupant of the reading desk below him, he said, "Nor are we, servants before the altar, always able to withstand temptation. There is my dear and venerable brother, the archdeacon; he is an instance of it. He once sold me a horse; it was unsound; I was a stranger and he took me in."

A Young Man's Companions

By William H. Maher

A FEW days ago the doors of a prison opened to admit a man whom I had known intimately for eighteen years. He had been tried and trusted, and was looked upon as proof against any temptation that could assail him; but he had fallen. His story was told in one sentence by his attorney, as he begged for leniency: the man had made evil acquaintances, and these had dragged him down to their own level and to his ruin.

The business man who writes to young men out of his own experience feels as if it were unnecessary, and a mere waste of time, to say a word to them about the influence upon their lives of the company they choose—just as he would consider it superfluous to write an essay to prove that two and two make four. Yet every business man, in his dealings with his own clerks, is largely influenced in his opinion of their characters by his knowledge of the men they associate with out of business hours.

The first copy-book in which the boy practices writing tells him that "A man is known by the company he keeps." A little farther on he writes, "Evil communications corrupt good manners." These sentiments are presented to him in varying forms at every step, until they are forgotten because they are so hackneyed. He agrees with them thoroughly. He believes that they should be the guiding star of every boy—except himself. He is quite confident that he may make an occasional exception in his own line of action, and run no risk in doing so.

Old Business Men's Judgment of the Younger Ones

Very few young men settle down to their life-work in the community in which they spent their boyhood. They seek a change, usually from a small to a larger place, and in going to the new locality have it in their power to make new acquaintances and an entirely fresh circle of friends.

A young man is a sociable person. He enjoys being with other people. He needs the relaxation of association after his busy workday, and he looks upon each new acquaintance as a means by which he widens his world and increases the avenues to social pleasure. He imagines that he is safe in accepting every offer of acquaintanceship that is made to him, because there is nothing to prevent him, at a later date, from winnowing out the undesirable friends.

But every older man who has passed through this same experience will tell him that this winnowing process is much simpler in theory than in practice. Some men, yes, many men, do put this to the test, and in looking back see that though they were able to untangle themselves from associates that were undesirable and becoming dangerous, they shudder at the risks they ran, as they also wonder how they escaped. They never recommend the experiment to others.

Not many people know a young man as he actually is. The men he works for, and the men he works with, know him fairly well—indeed usually far better than he knows himself—but outside of his workshop, or his place of business, men judge him by the occasional glimpses they have of him. They judge him:

By his bearing, whether it is modest or assertive.

By his manner, whether or no it is quiet, courteous and thoughtful.

By his language, whether or no it is clean and refined, with evidence of education.

And last, but probably the most important of all, by the company he keeps.

A Good Instance of a Common Error of Belief

There is no greater mistake than to suppose that employers are indifferent to what a clerk is or does out of work hours. This state of affairs might be true in very large offices, but these are few as compared with the legions of smaller concerns that cover the business world. One of the brightest men of my acquaintance, one fast working to the head of a large concern, a place that meant a good salary and honors in the community, was brought face to face with this question when those in authority over him demanded his resignation, because they thought a man who was filling his position should not turn Sunday into a day of carousal. A man was found with very little trouble to take his place, but the discharged man was out of work for a year or two, and then accepted a situation at one-half his former salary.

An officer in an institution who was a marvel of rapidity and accuracy, who never left his desk with any task lying there undone, fancied he had the right to make such acquaintances out of business hours as he pleased; but he lost his position through his unwarranted assumption and his future is probably ruined.

When a merchant sees his employee nod in a friendly way to a man who is known to be a gambler, he does not feel so easy in his mind thenceforward. He wonders where the acquaintanceship was made and how far it has gone. When he knows that a good friend of his clerk is one who is regular in his visits to the saloon, he fears that his young man is starting on the same course. When the boon companions of his clerk are a crowd of loud fellows who shift from one job to another at frequent intervals, he begins to look for some one else to take that clerk's place.

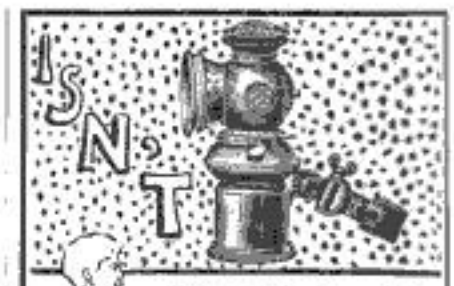
Those were good old days when the apprentice was taken into the house of his employer and made one of the family, but they are no longer possible. The employer can know the character of his clerk out of business hours only by observing what his pleasures and who his companions are.

The impression seems to be quite general that every young man who goes as a stranger to a larger place finds it much easier to make acquaintances among the bad and undesirable than among the better class. I think this is true only when the young man's tastes and desires lead him to seek naturally the company of the tainted.

If there are fifty saloons on his homeward route at evening, no one stands at the doors of these to compel him to enter: if he goes in it is because he desires to do so. If the lights and music tempt him it is because he has thought of these, and the life they represent, until they appear attractive to him.

No matter how poor he is he is not compelled to choose between a little bedroom in which to spend his evenings and the gorgeous drinking place. The entire property of the city is taxed to furnish him a reading-room and a library which exceed in volumes and comfort the finest library owned by the richest man of the town.

The Need of Support and Stimulus



Every young man who has tasted of the cup of wisdom is a timid man. He does not boast of his strength; he realizes that he needs every form of help he can secure; he knows that there are restraints that are helpful, for mistakes are both of omission and commission, and he puts himself in the way of influences that will hold him up in the time of trial. He needs these to keep him from that which is deteriorating, and to support him in the day of temptation.

He should select his boarding-house with great care. If his pay is small, as it usually is with the boy who is starting in life, he is limited in his choice; but, admitting this, there still is a choice. A dark room, with a family of refinement, is far superior to a better one where ignorance and vulgarity preside over the household.

The young man should strive to make acquaintance with those who have homes, rather than with those who are boarders like himself. If such acquaintance leads to friendship, and the friend's home is opened to him, he has cause to congratulate himself and be thankful. He should strive by every way in his power to make his visits pleasant, so that he may continue to be welcomed where he can breathe the atmosphere of a home.

He should go to church. No one on earth needs the moral stimulus that regular church-going gives so much as the young man who is alone in a strange city. I am not suggesting that he should join a church; that is a matter between himself and his God. I do not say that he shall pretend to be religious, whether he is or not. I do not counsel that he shall play the hypocrite. I simply say that in order that his better nature may be frequently appealed to, and that he may place himself where good influences will meet him, he should be regular in his attendance upon church.

The poorest sermon that was ever preached, unless it was upon mere dogma, did good to some one of those who heard it. It may have lifted no one any nearer to the

The Eagle's Heart

By

Hamlin Garland

¶ The hero is a young man who leaves an Eastern home and goes West to become a cattleman. His life on the plains furnishes an unbroken succession of stirring exploits and adventures with herders, cattlemen, Indians, desperados and typical "bad men." The threads of a charming love-story are skilfully woven into the web of these divers adventures.

¶ The Eagle's Heart has been superbly illustrated with half-tone and pen-and-ink drawings by Mr. Harrison Fisher, who, with his pictures for The Market-Place in THE SATURDAY EVENING POST, made a place for himself in the front rank of American illustrators.

The Eagle's Heart will begin in an early number.

¶ A trial subscription to THE SATURDAY EVENING POST (five months for one dollar) will include the whole of this splendid serial, and provide you with a summer's entertainment.

skies, and yet have been helpful in that it kept some one from dropping any lower than he was. I am writing as a business man, and writing of the worldly view of business, but I realize the great help it is to a young man that he should have noble ideals presented to him steadily; that his conscience should be kept alive and quickened; and that he should be obliged to look at himself in a mirror, where he can compare his own frailties with a perfect type of manhood.

Common-Sense Reasons for Bible Study He should join a class in Sunday-school, and for two good reasons: the first, that he may read and study and know the Bible. I am taking it for granted that he is continuing his education, although out of school and at work. That education which ignores the Bible, whether the young man is a tinner's apprentice or a bookkeeper, is ill-balanced and superficial. This is not because it is, or is not, an inspired book. It is the history of all that is highest and lowest in mankind; the depths to which he can sink in degradation and despair; the heights that he might reach if he but would.

To join a Bible-class is to put one's self where one is studying the best literature, and making it a little easier to resist temptation during the week.

Another reason for joining a Bible-class, and one more directly in line with the heading of this article, is that it enlarges the circle of his acquaintances. I fancy that some critic will say I am encouraging him to pretend to be what he is not, for purely commercial purposes. But if he visits a saloon or billiard-room to seek acquaintances no one thinks of suggesting that he is playing the hypocrite. If a young man is coaxed into a church from the gutter; if he is then persuaded to join a class in Sunday-school, no one thinks of charging those who encourage him with aiding hypocrisy. And because a young man should seek these aids of his own accord, desiring to be among good people and under good influences, this seems to me to be both right and proper—and equally as far removed from the suspicion of hypocrisy. Now I am very careful not to suggest that he should join the church, that he should assume to be religious whether he is or not, or that he should be anything in the Bible-class but a scholar. These are matters of religion, not of business.

The Turning of the Old to the New Generation All the world feels kindly toward a modest young man. He is Hope and Courage personified. He dares everything. The middle-aged watch him with a tinge of envy for the illimitable possibilities that shine in his eager face. His future is inscrutable, but the business world looks to him for its coming princes and kings. He will solve the riddles that defied his predecessors. He has inherited all their knowledge but is not handicapped by their timidity. They welcome his companionship, for his talk renews the happy days of their youth. They glow under his approval and admiration. Through him they hope to project themselves into the future when their own personality has disappeared. All they ask is that he shall treat them with respect, shall listen with some interest to their experiences, and pay some slight deference to their counsels. A word of praise from these men has weight in the business world, and this is so easily earned by a manly young man that it is a never-ending puzzle to me that so few of them strive for it, or put themselves in the way of obtaining it. The great masses of young men are so keen after "pleasures" and excitement that they fail to see or appreciate the hands of the older generation that are held out in friendly invitation.

The time will come, if the young man is friendly, when friendly hands will be held out to him, and instead of being invited to play "a game," or to see the "sights," or do that which, if his employers knew, would cost him his position, he will be introduced to clean, intellectual pleasures and companionships, and meet people whom he will be glad to know, and whose acquaintanceship will be a help and inspiration to him.

His employers and business acquaintances will have watched these steps with keen interest, and when there is an opening he will be pushed higher, for his character and associates give assurance of trustworthiness, self-control, self-respect and high aims. He has placed a high valuation upon himself, and the world accepts this as his true value. Only his own acts will ever change this judgment.

At the other end of the table sat a small man with gray mustache and goatee.

The head waiter came forward with his ready napkin, brushed off an imaginary crumb at Mr. Sanders' elbow, picked up the glass of water, and substituted for it another glass that sat on the window-ledge.

"Have you given your order, sir?" he asked.

"I reckon I did," replied Mr. Sanders, "but it's been so long ago it seems like a dream."

"Would you like a dish of fried spring onions, sir? They are very fresh and tender."

"Would I?" exclaimed Mr. Sanders. "Well, I'd thank you might'ly to try me—I ain't had a mess sence I left the neighborhood of Salem."

The man who had the appearance of a divinity student leaned back in his chair and balanced his fork on the forefinger of his left hand. "Salem—Salem," he said. "Pardon me, sir, but where is Salem?"

"Well, ef they ain't been no harrycane nor yethquake, Salem is in the State of Injianny."

"Why, certainly—to be sure! What am I thinking about?" sighed the stranger.

"Reely, I couldn't tell you," replied Mr. Sanders.

The other smiled as he wiped his glasses. "Well, I should have known about Salem, for I went to college with a relative of mine from that town. In fact, I think I have a number of relatives in Salem."

"What's the name?" inquired Mr. Sanders in his matter-of-fact way.

"Webb."

"When did they move there?"

"Three or four years ago, I think."

"Sam Webb was the chap you went to college wi'?"

"Yes," the other assented.

"What kin was you to him?"

"Cousin—first cousin."

At this Mr. Sanders leaned back in his chair and laughed until he was red in the face.

"What's the joke?" inquired the man who looked like a divinity student.

"Well, ef I ain't got old Granny Webb on the hooks, I don't want a cent!" exclaimed Mr. Sanders with a fresh burst of laughter. "Here she's been tellin' me for long years that there ain't a raut in the Webb family, on narry side, for generations, an' I ain't no more'n got to town before the little fust cousin runs under my hand same as a tame rat."

The hit was so palpable and so unexpected that even Bethune joined in the roar that came from the others around the table. The first cousin laughed, too, but it was plain to see that he was more irritated than pleased.

"But don't you fret, my friend. Steve Douglas is a raut, but he's a mighty big man, all the same. I was a Douglas man before the war, but after Old Abe up'd an' said he was for the Union, nigger or no nigger, why then I was a Lincoln man."

"And yet," said the first cousin persuasively, "they say there are a good many Southern sympathizers around and about in places."

"I reckon that's so," said Mr. Sanders. "My farm has been cleared a good many year, but hardly a spring passes but what I have to kill a snake or two."

Bethune noticed that a great change had come over the head waiter. He was fairly beaming on the guests as they came and went. In fact, he was radiant. His eyes sparkled and his whole manner showed that he was a well-pleased man. As for Bethune, he was astonished at the ease with which Mr. Sanders had handled a dangerous adversary. He had known that his companion possessed a courage that was absolutely invincible, but now Mr. Sanders was displaying a new and a rarer quality.

The stranger made no more remarks, but addressed himself to his dinner and hurried through it. As he was rising from the table, Mr. Sanders took his knife from his mouth to say:

"Ef you ever come out to Salem to visit your kin, lope out to my farm. It's about four miles out on what they call the Kaintucky pike. I'll tell Granny Webb I seed you; she'll be tickled to death."

"Why, thank you," replied the stranger. "I shall certainly call on you should I ever come to Indiana."

"So do!" Mr. Sanders rejoined.

Whereupon the spectacled man and his bewhiskered companion retired.

The Voice of the People*

I like this book, and there is really no reason for not saying so "first off," instead of mildly implying it in the last lines. A great character, with a relieving note of imperfection, and a supreme act of self-sacrifice—for these things the world cares more than it cares for terrapin and champagne, though you would not always think so.

Ellen Glasgow is said to be young, but her generosity and directness disarm any sour analysis of the limitations of her youth. She does not always blend cunningly the relations of man to his surroundings. Sunset, moonlight and the changing moods of the seasons properly play their part in the human drama, but in The Voice of the People they are sometimes intrusive and unrelated. Thomas Hardy would help the author, whose sensibilities are finer, as yet, than her mechanics. Character sketching, with a strong relish for idealization, is the strength of the book.

It matters little if this is a faithful showing of Southern people to-day; it matters much that a Southern woman should have the impulse to write so feelingly and with so large a tolerance. Forgiveness and fair-mindedness are on every page, while bitterness seems alien to her nature. All else tends naturally to the need for concentration on one central figure, that of a lad born in the pitiful humility of a "poor white" family. His father worked with entire fidelity over his profitless acres of peanuts; his stepmother, gauntly tragic, ruled a sordid little kingdom. From these conditions, the boy, inspired by that which lights every darkness, would escape. He fell back, enthralled by inheritance, but again and again went forward. He became Governor of Virginia, and died, seeking to purify the Old Dominion from that hideous blemish on the South—a disparagement of its own constituted law. To work out this development of character it was needful that Nick Burr should lose, of a sudden and blamelessly, the light which had guided him to a point—a woman's love. Of the two he was the worthier, and, unerringly, he had to see it. Victory over himself and his obstacles brought him strength and also hardness, though this was eventually softened by an act of forgiveness.

I am conscious of saying the handsome thing of two books, in letting myself fancy that in Nick Burr is to be seen the Peter Stirling of the South: self-centred, humane, absolutely rock-bound in his fealty to political honor—not a priggish honor, but the sort which defies the enemies of the State with granitic stubbornness. I like to think of the basic qualities of this red-maned giant, of a homeliness akin to that of Mirabeau; they bade him, at the two greatest crises of his life, to curse roundly and fundamentally, when other men would have framed a sentence. As I said, I like this book. It is almost good enough to be excluded by Reading Committees from the Public Libraries. —Lindsay Swift.

Andromeda†

Mr. Buchanan's Andromeda has a far harder time than that famous Princess of ancient Hellas whose name she bears. Instead of being of the blood royal she is hampered from the outset by unpleasantly obscure antecedents. The place of her captivity is not the lovely land of the fable, but the dreariest island washed by the waters of the Thames, while the mythological dragon was a playful domestic animal compared to the monster who claims this modern Andromeda as his lawful prey. Moreover, the unfeeling author even denies her the consolation of the godlike hero she has every right to expect, giving her as a substitute for the courageous Perseus an inane youth of pleasing exterior and emotional temperament, whose calibre can be gauged accurately and dispassionately by the simple statement (we have Mr. Buchanan's word for it) that he is addicted to the lavish use of scented soap.

The plot hinges on a decidedly hackneyed situation—the inopportune return of the piratical villain after his certified death in a California mining camp. It seems impossible for English novelists to find a spot in America where their villains can be successfully disposed of. It must be very discouraging to have them always back on their hands again! But let them take heart, for there is light ahead; our new Pacific possessions offer a promising field for permanent banishment.

Mr. Buchanan evidently saw through a fog darkly while writing Andromeda, as a gloomy atmosphere pervades the book from cover to cover. There is no mirth, none of the joy of life, or that tender sentiment we naturally look for in a self-styled idyll; but in spite of this he tells his story interestingly and it doubtless holds the dramatic possibilities he claims for it. For stage purposes, however, his choice of the early Victorian era was an unwise one, as there is no period more hopelessly inartistic.

—Evelyn J. Curriden.

Glimpses of New Books

Mr. Ernest Seton-Thompson in The Biography of a Grizzly follows the careful, painstaking method with brush and pen which marked his earlier Wild Animals I Have Known. The story of Wahb the Grizzly is carried from his cubhood to his old age and ultimate death. Mrs. Thompson has, as heretofore, lent her skillful supervision to the letterpress. The Century Company.

Now that the rush to Cape Nome is on, Mr. Tappan Adney's account of the Klondike Stampede rings like a note of warning. Mr. Adney was in the diggings during 1897 and 1898, and illustrates his narrative with many photographs. Harper & Brothers.

"A sand burr is a foolish, small vegetable, irritating and grievously useless; therefore," announces Mr. Alfred Henry Lewis, "this volume of sketches is named Sand Burrs." It really isn't so bad as that. It may be true that, as Mr. Lewis says later, "the Bowery dialect is not an exalted literature," but it would be difficult to stop long enough to be irritated at any one of such a shifting, turning crowd of faces and figures as press the streets of the East Side. And as for their being foolish—why, we have the author's word for it that they are all true! Frederick A. Stokes Company.

Mr. C. W. Van Der Hoogt, in The Story of the Boers, writes of the current events in South Africa in a natural spirit of race sympathy. He characterizes the events leading up to the war as a century of injustice, and looks upon English interpretations of the various conventions at Sand River, Pretoria, and London with scarcely a more kindly eye. Mr. Montagu White prefaces Mr. Van Der Hoogt's volume with a plea for the policy of mediation. Harper & Brothers.

When was it that Admiral Dewey sailed into Manila Harbor? May 1, 1898, wasn't it? Two years ago, roughly; and since then Mr. Edward Strateymeyer has had time to be Under Dewey at Manila, to be Fighting With a Young Volunteer in Cuba, and by some Pucklike rapidity of movement, at the same time to be Fighting in Cuban Waters. Shortly after, he served Under Otis in the Philippines, and by the same marvel of ubiquity took part in The Campaign of the Jungle, Under Lawton. At least, he writes about all these things; he must then have been on the field to have described them; he would not dare impose on us, surely. Literature used to be a contemplative and quiet, loving profession—trade, if you will. It has indeed become a pursuit in these days. To what lengths will love of local color carry us! Lee & Sheppard.

A Biography of Marie Corelli

Miss Marie Corelli's biography in that entertaining volume, Who's Who, is one of the longest in the book, and gives a fairly detailed sketch of her career. But the fact that nowhere else can much more be found concerning the novelist marks Miss Corelli off from most of the authors whose names are ranged with hers. Miss Corelli has believed in frankness in novels but not in sensation in newspapers. Paradoxically enough, however, her refusal to be interviewed, or to have her picture printed, has been more sensational than all the personal journalism which has helped to make the fame of other writers. It is said now, however, that Miss Corelli means to relax her austerity somewhat, and that, under her own supervision and with her own approval, a volume is to be prepared giving an account of her life and the story of her literary career and its aims. The book will be extremely interesting, for even those who deny Miss Corelli's rights to claim permanent literary merit cannot deny that she has been a striking and forcible figure.

Those who know her say she is a most interesting personality as well. They are not many, however, for, even when she lived in London, Miss Corelli's life was a retired one and she went little to the regular haunts of writers and journalists. Her habits of work led her to the quiet of the country. It was tucked away in a corner of Hants that an American visitor, on one of those literary pilgrimages to which Americans are so faithful, asked of the broad-faced landlord if it was not under his roof that Keats had written his Endymion, and might she not see the room. "Keats—Keats!" The landlord scratched his grizzled head—and then, with a sudden brightening: Ah! but he could show the room where Marie Corelli had written The Sorrows of Satan.

For the last few years Miss Corelli has been living in Stratford-on-Avon, less than ever in touch with literary London. A few friends come to see her, that is all. Miss Corelli's first house in Stratford was a very ancient one, said to have been built by Shakespeare's son-in-law. Later she has moved to a house called Avon Grange, which, if less rich in historical memories, is a no less charming house. Miss Corelli is an acquisition to Stratford, and is ready to help in any public or charitable enterprise. London could not make her leave her retirement, but Stratford has induced her even to open bazars with a speech for the charity in aid of which the sale was held.

Max O'Rell's Slim Young Man

Paul Blouet (Max O'Rell) was a sick man when he came to this country last fall. Naturally his American experiences were not exhilarating. On the night before he sailed for Europe he told a party of friends the most exasperating happening of the lot.

"This is not the first time I have been in America," he said. "I know the customs of the land and the people, and when the ship landed I was prepared for the American interviewer. I have met him before.

"Among the reporters was a slender youth from one of the big morning papers. I knew the editor and I thought he would give me a good show, so I spread myself for this lad. I spoke well. I spoke eloquently. I did the subject justice. Before leaving I made an appointment to meet this particular young man at my hotel at nine o'clock the next morning.

"When I opened that slim young man's paper the next day I was speechless with anger. Not a word of my interview appeared, but the youth had written about the bald spot on my head, making it larger. He had described how my nose had grown more prominent; how my cheeks had fallen away, and how I had lost my color. He told about my decrease of weight and described my legs as 'pipe stems.' I was walking the floor when the young man came in and by a violent effort I controlled myself. Then I said to him as calmly as I could:

"'My dear young man, I have been reading your account of me and I notice that you have described in detail every part of my body except my foot, and now, sir, I propose that you shall feel that, and you shall learn, sir, that I have not lost all my strength yet even if I——'

"But before I finished the reporter fled."

Authors at Home and in the Field

Opponents of Mr. Kipling's political views upon South African questions are fond of saying that he is no longer a literary man, but only a politician. Yet one may still be allowed to call him the most prominent writer who is at the Cape. It is said, however, that Mr. Kipling himself has little idea that any fiction will result from his present trip south. Of Dr. Conan Doyle, on the other hand, much may be expected. He will unquestionably do valuable work in the hospital service, but if he has any political views to put forward he will probably embody them in a novel, as he did his views on Egypt in The Tragedy of the Korosko.

The man who knows South Africa best, and whom one would perhaps most like to see there, Mr. Rider Haggard, is now so immersed in the problems of English farming that he seems to have given up writing fiction, and traveling as well. Mr. A. E. W. Mason is at home in London, writing furiously, only because a slight defect in his eyesight kept him from being accepted when he tried to enlist.

Of the usual war correspondents, Mr. Poulteney Bigelow has been too ill to go to the front, and Mr. Stephen Crane is still in the quiet of Sussex—perhaps because he is married, and marriage sometimes induces men to give up the undoubted dangers of war correspondence. It is said that if poor G. W. Steevens had come safely home from the Cape it would have been his last campaign—that he had promised his wife it should be. Mr. Richard Harding Davis was accompanied by his wife when he left London. Mrs. Davis would have gone to the front unhesitatingly had the authorities been willing, and those who know her say that she would have made as daring and resourceful a journalist as any there. As it is, it is likely that she and her prize bulldog Jaggers will push up from Cape Town as fast as military rules and regulations will allow. Naturally among the correspondents are some who are novelists as well. Mr. Winston Spencer Churchill's Savrola is just out, and many readers will remember Mr. H. E. Nevinson, correspondent of the Morning Chronicle, as the author of delicious stories of life in the London East End.

Our First Marine Bands

By EDGAR STANTON MACLAY

Author of A History of the United States Navy

BECAUSE Uncle Sam did not have a brass band in the navy during the Revolution, it does not follow that he possessed the savage breast that refused to be soothed by the charms of music. On the contrary, he has shown a decided liking for the Muse, but being a poor young man at the time of his struggle for liberty, his only means of gratifying this passion were a drum and fife; or perhaps by whistling, accompanied by a pair of bone clappers. At any rate there is no record of a band of music being aboard a United States warship until 1802—and, shameful to say, that band was deliberately stolen.

The robbery was perpetrated by Captain Daniel McNiell, of the twenty-eight-gun corvette Boston. McNiell was an officer famous in the early navy for absolute fearlessness and a somewhat eccentric twist in his character which led him into several curious predicaments. In 1802, while the Boston was at Messina, a band belonging to one of the regiments quartered at that city came aboard, just to show the "wild men" from the New World what music was like. The "wild men," it seems, appreciated the concert too much, for Captain McNiell promptly tripped anchor, made sail and stood out to sea. In spite of the frantic appeals and protests of the unfortunate musicians, the Boston passed out into the Atlantic and made America in due time, with the musicians aboard.

Of course our Government was not going to war over a lot of kidnaped musicians, so Captain McNiell's act was promptly disavowed and that officer was not again put in a position where his love for a marine band could get the better of his discretion. It is interesting to note, however, that the Government was not so prompt in returning the musicians to their homes. In fact several of them were homeward-bound in the frigate Chesapeake, in 1807, when that ship was captured—and again these luckless musicians were thrown on their beam ends.

The Capture of the Macedonian Marine Band

The first band of music in the United States Navy having been acquired by theft, we need not be surprised to find that the second band was captured by force of arms. In her cruise in which she was captured by the forty-four-gun frigate United States, the English thirty-eight-gun frigate Macedonian had a band of eight musicians aboard. Captain Carden, the commander of the Macedonian, apparently had some difficulty in inducing these men to serve in his ship, for we find it stated that they insisted on a clause in their contract which stipulated that, in case of battle, they were to be put somewhere down in the hold where they would be safe. Accordingly, when the doughty British ship fell in with the United States, these musicians promptly reminded Captain Carden of this clause and forthwith they were stowed away in the cable tier. When the Americans came aboard to take possession they discovered these men and took them aboard the Yankee craft. Decatur, the American commander, took a great fancy to these musicians and induced them to enlist in his ship. This was the band that astonished the people of New York when the United States, with her prize, arrived at that port. The American crew landed at New York, marched uptown preceded by the band.

This was the only real live band in the American Navy at that time and Decatur enjoyed the distinction of having it aboard the vessels he commanded. Accordingly, when the war with Algiers broke out, in 1815, and Decatur was placed in command of the new forty-four-gun frigate Guerrière, he managed to smuggle his band aboard the ship. He finished up that war in true man-of-war's style, and after the conditions of peace had been signed he landed his band and gave the natives a purely American rendering of Hail Columbia.

Bands were very rare in British warships at that time. Captain Broke, of the Shannon, Carden's ranking officer, was very fond of music, but had not succeeded in smuggling a brass band aboard the Shannon. In his action with the Cheasapeake, June 1, 1813, he was desperately wounded. One day on the passage to Halifax, during a very heavy fog, the Shannon's people were startled by the shrill piping of the tune, Yankee Doodle. Many thought that an American frigate had approached under cover of the fog and was about to give battle. The piper, however, proved to be the Shannon's. He had been ordered to play that air by Captain Broke himself, who quaintly remarked: "I thought nothing would cheer me up so much as that old tune."

Decatur did not long enjoy the honor of having the only band in the navy. Many of our early commanders were musically inclined and encouraged their men in the formation of marine bands. In those large ship companies there were sure to be some who were proficient in the use of various musical instruments, and, under the fostering care of a friendly commander, they were not long in organizing bands, so that soon after the close of the war of 1812 marine bands in our war craft were the rule rather than the exception.

A Band that Astonished the Natives

Captain Edward Trenchard, while commanding the twenty-gun sloop of war Cyane—captured in 1815 from the British by Old Ironsides—notes in his private journal that a band of music had been organized by the members of the crew. This band was called on to perform at all festive occasions and "played regularly once a day for practice." It is not probable that the Cyane's band attained the high degree of excellence of our modern marine bands. The musicians of the high seas in those days did not occupy the important position they hold to-day in first-class warships, and the few manipulators of wind and brass instruments in the Cyane would have made a poor showing to the cultivated ear of the modern tar, who is used to the best of martial music.

It is recorded, however, that the Cyane's band made a great impression on the natives of the western coast of Africa, where that ship, in 1820, was stationed. To hear this wonderful band was one of the great events along this coast and its fame extended even to the islands of the sea. On May 19 the Cyane put into Port Pray after a cruise in search of slavers. The people there had heard of her band, and scarcely had her anchor been dropped when a messenger came aboard with the announcement that "His Excellency, the Governor-General, solicits the pleasure of Captain Trenchard's company, with that of all the officers of the Cyane, to tea this evening, and would be highly gratified with having a few tunes from Captain Trenchard's band, which he solicits may be permitted to come on shore with their musical instruments, as the evening will be rendered delightful and pleasant by a full moon."

This enchanting invitation to tea and a "full moon" was sent through one Hodges, an English-speaking person on the island, who was to act as interpreter. Captain Trenchard accepted the invitation and called on the Governor. After a decent amount of time had been allowed the Americans for the contemplation of the tea and the "full moon," the natives were treated to the awe-inspiring sounds from the Cyane's band. With forethought, bred of experience, the bandmaster labeled in advance the tunes he was about to render so that there would be no dispute among the auditors on that point.

There can be no question of the stimulating effect of music at all times, and especially at moments of national interest. The policy of American naval administrations for a century has been to discourage the use of alcohol in the navy, while the average British commander was dealing out extra grog to his men on the eve of battle. Advanced civilization has shown that intoxicating beverages are a most dangerous and altogether unsatisfactory stimulant in time of battle, but the band of music, and even the drum or fife alone, have always been found a most potent means of stimulating the men to extraordinary exertions. Hence it is that the marine band has come to stay.

The Two Youths Among the Nations

By ALBERT J. BEVERIDGE

Copyright, 1909, by The Curtis Publishing Company

IT WAS Emerson who called attention to the fact that with nations, as with men, it is all a question of heart beats, all a matter of arterial circulation. It is an obvious and yet a very profound truth that men wear out, and so do nations wear out, since nations are merely aggregations of men. And it is a very simple deduction that the whole problem of life is to preserve youth. Everybody knows that youth means growth, means the doing of things, means creation, construction, expansion. Conversely, age means decay, disintegration, the return to the original elements out of which the aging man or nation was first formed. After all, we cannot get away from the biological basis. And so it is quite clear that the duty of statesmanship is to preserve the youth of the people it serves. And youth is preserved by preserving the processes of youth—by building, growing, keeping active the creative energies. Youth is synthetic and imaginative; age is analytic, reminiscent and reflective. Youth seeks new fields to cultivate; age retreats even from the old ones; and this is just as true of nations as of men. Take the testimony of our American philosopher again. Says Emerson: "A good deal of our politics is physiological. . . . In England there is always some man of wealth and large connection, planting himself, during all his years of health, on the side of progress, who, as soon as he begins to die, checks his forward play, calls in his troops and becomes conservative. All conservatives are such from physical defects. They have been effeminated by position or Nature, born halt or blind through luxury of their parents, and can only, like invalids, act on the defensive. But strong natures, backwoodsmen, New Hampshire giants, Napoleons, Burkes, Broughams, Websters, Kossuths, are inevitable patriots until their life ebbs, and their defects and gout, palsy and money warp them." Thus Emerson—and while it seems to be untrue of individuals, it is certainly true of nations. The advantages of youth are well-nigh terrible in peoples and in individuals. No matter how completely the older peoples may occupy all of the present positions of superiority; no matter how the guns may be trained upon us to-day, we know that to-morrow those guns will be rust, the hands that trained them will have vanished, and that we shall be occupying still stronger positions than they do now, still higher up the steeps of power.

The Man to Plan the To-morrow of America

It was the perception of this elemental truth that made Peter the Great one of the most far-sighted statesman who ever lived. He knew that Russia would degenerate utterly if confined within mere land boundaries. He knew that nations breathe only through the sea—ports are breathing places. He knew that the more Russia touched the rest of the world the greater she would be. He conceived the simple but grand idea of Russia as an ever-growing, ever-expanding, and therefore ever-youth-renewing power. Or let us rather say that he was the incarnation of the desire of the Russian people—the personification of their racial purpose. To effectuate this great conception he laid down certain broad lines of national procedure that reached farther into futurity than any statesman, perhaps, who ever planned beyond his own immediate day. All the Russian statesmen since the period of Peter have largely been the executors of the great idea of the mighty man, whose vast intellect and burning activity made men in his day call him mad. It is this same conception which to-day is dominating the mind of the American people. And America will respond to the man who adequately gives expression to our master instinct. The intelligence of our people is so unusual that their common thought is larger and truer than that of any one man, and penetrates deeper into the coming centuries; and he will best plan the to-morrow of the American people who is the truest interpreter of their tendencies and purposes.

The same thing, and fundamentally from the same cause, is true of the great Russian Empire and of the great American Republic. We are the two youths of the world. We are the two entirely unexhausted peoples. We are the two expanding powers—the two powers, that is, that will continue to grow and develop in the coming centuries. And this is no reflection on the other great nations—perhaps to-day greater nations. They have achieved their development. But the period of American development is already here; and the development of Russia is beginning. Neither of us has achieved so much in art, philosophy, literature, law or even commerce as at least three of the other of the great, and one may say splendid, nations of to-day; but we have the advantage of youth. We hold the future in our hands. Not that England and Germany and other nations do not hold a noble future in their hands, too. (In Africa, England is securing room for great development also.) And let England thank God for her Cecil Rhodes, her Lord Cromers, and for all those other material and constructive minds who seek, find or create new fields for English constructive enterprise, for commerce and for the continuation of England's world-work. It is good to read of a man who lives on the earth to-day similar to those of whom the Bible speaks when it says, "And he founded a city." It is good to know that there are men who are founding something, planting something, building something, creating something, and so long as England has those daring souls who prefer the wilds of Africa to the wiles of London, who prefer the jungle and the mountains of hazard to the ease of society, she will not fail—no, nor falter.

The Similarity of Russian and American Types

No traveler can fail to be fascinated with the singular charm of the harbor of Nagasaki, in Japan. It has few superiors in beauty and convenience in the world. The greatest ships move in deep water up to within a stone's throw of the shore. The hills, pine-clad and shrouded with that blue haze that so softens and beautifies the Japanese landscape, holds the harbor of still bluer water in loving embrace. Wooded islands stand like sentinels at its entrance—and they are sentinels indeed, fortified with the heaviest and most modern guns. Many days I have spent in this harbor, and I have never seen a time when Russian vessels of war were not anchored there. Once I was a guest on one of the noblest of these ships. A middle-aged officer, speaking English, thoroughly familiar with the geography, climate, products and politics of the United States, entertained with instructive talk. He was strangely American in appearance, manner, apparently in ideas. Two of the subaltern officers arrived from shore leave during the visit. One of them was of the Royal family of the Romanoffs. Their light hair, blue eyes, straight nose (anything but Tartar; and why do people mentally associate them with Tartar blood—they have none), thin nostril, delicate lip and singular alertness of manner and idea would have convinced you that they were American. They were of the type of the young American in appearance and in mental attitude.

I was not greatly interested in the ship, although one of Russia's latest; in course of time it will be archaic, as will all present vessels of war of every nation. But the men—they were of fundamental interest. They will not be archaic in a few years, nor their nation! Or will they? That is the question which is of infinitely more importance than ships, or guns, or commerce, or possessions, or geography. I asked to see the men. They were superb. They were young men, of course, but they were youthful young men. They were not old young men. They were young men of a race in its youth; in short, they were like our own young men. They made one think of the appearance of the people who fill the common coaches of the American railway trains; and there is no better place to study the characteristics of our people and to get the inspiration of their vast and youthful vitality. This similarity in youthfulness of the two peoples—the American and Russian—will impress any one who looks beneath surface differences.

One day, on the boat from Cologne to Mayence on the Rhine, I appeared to be the only American—was the only American. I had asked the German band on board if they would not render a certain German national composition. The request drew forth a remark from a gentleman I had not noticed before, and I was sure I had found a compatriot. He looked like an American professional man. Later I was presented to his wife and daughter—they, too, looked like Americans. As a matter of fact, he is an eminent Russian physician of St. Petersburg.

The Bond Between America and Russia

The similarity is startlingly apparent in the history of Russian and American expansion. The fascinating stories of the Russian Cossack exploration and settlement eastward and of the American pioneer expansion to the westward are so similar that, with the change of dates and names, one might be substituted for the other. Instead of the Stroganoffs we had Astor and the Hudson Bay Company; instead of Lewis and Cass and Fremont, the Russians had Yermak, Atlasoff and Khabaroff. There is nothing in American history so full of vitality, of racial inspiration as the story of Boone and Crockett and Carson, and all that company of fearless hearts who sought solitude and courted death to extend the dominion of the American flag on our own continent; and their story, which so thrills our blood to-day, can be reproduced in the recital of the adventures of the pioneers of Russia, who swept across "the girdle of the world," as the Ural Mountains were called, dared the unknown, seized Siberia, captured the Ameer, and, in a word, obeyed the instincts of the Russian people of which they, in their way, were merely the servants and forerunners. Frozen, starved, murdered by savage tribes in the new lands which they explored, the American and Russian pioneers have reached out in the centuries that are past, one toward the East and the other toward the West, in precisely the same manner, asking nothing better than an unmarked grave as their reward for extending the dominion of their respective peoples.

"Yes, I think undoubtedly that you Americans will control things for the next three hundred years, perhaps the next five hundred years," said the Russian naval officer, as we discussed the world and events on the deck of this great destroyer in Nagasaki. "But after that it will be our turn. We are not ready yet. We are not sufficiently developed yet. We have youth without development; you have youth with development. Our business for the next three hundred years, anyhow, will be development. Our business will be getting ready. You are ready now." His casual words were deeply true. They are a statement of the conclusion to which every inquiring and thinking mind arrives.

Russia is like a world in formation. We are like a world newly formed, and full of vast productive energies. The conclusion from these two great facts states itself. Russia is, and for a long time yet will be, one of the choicest fields for our activities. Siberia is to be developed—her forests felled, her mines opened, her fields tilled; and Siberia's natural resources are tremendous—minerals, woods, agricultural possibilities. Already the number of her inhabitants is very considerable. Her population within the next hundred years will run into the tens of millions. Russia herself—I mean European Russia—is still undeveloped. Some person has got to develop that great dominion. Some person has got to build the railroads, furnish the machinery, construct the public and private works, manufacture and sell the goods, supply all the increasing wants of the Russian people and every part and dependency of the Russian Empire. None of the European nations is in so fortunate a position as the United States to do all this, because of the conflicts, jealousies, hatreds, and the scores of complications of Old World politics, springing out of present conditions and inherited from the conditions of a recent and remote past. The American Republic alone stands in an unrivaled position to supply the needs of the Russian Empire during the period of its development. The Russians prefer to buy from us what they cannot make or raise themselves. They prefer that we should build their railroads, that we should construct their buildings, that we should make their machinery, that we should sell them their clothing, that we should do all of the great work of development which they themselves cannot do. The reason for this is twofold. First, Russia has nothing to fear from us—for a century at least, as she thinks. Second, there is a fraternal feeling which has been fostered for a hundred years by both American and Russian statesmen and which has created a sentiment which is and will always be an invaluable asset in international dealings, whether political or commercial. But there is yet a third reason, which has its roots deeper than the policy of statesmen, in the soil of a common youth among the nations of the world and of a common certainty of future mastery. It is the same law which draws young men together in politics, or in business effort at the beginning of their careers.

Our Common Growth on Parallel Lines

Development! Development! Development! That is the thing upon which the Russian mind is intent. It is the thing to which her location, resources and the period now reached in the progress of her people force her. And it is the thing upon which the American mind should fasten itself, not in fear nor in envy, but with a realization of the opportunity it brings us. Of course the irresistible expansion of the Russian Empire, the sure, gradual, even perhaps slow, but manifestly mighty awakening of the Russian people, may cause alarm in the minds of the statesmen and people of other nations of the world. But it should not cause uneasiness in our minds. It should not even cause jealousy. If it makes other nations jealous or uneasy that is not an unfortunate fact for us. The Russian people are proceeding along the same lines upon which we are proceeding, more slowly than we, and far behind us. They have the same right to develop, to expand, to work out their destiny that we have. Indeed, it is hardly a question of "right," used in the narrow sense; for Russian expansion and development in the future, like American expansion and development in the present, and British expansion and development, which seemed to have reached its limit till Rhodes came with his misunderstood but imperial mind, and Roman expansion and development in her period, are merely great forces of Nature working themselves out in human society and civilization. And these forces will continue to work out their—shall we not say predestined?—results, no matter who is pleased or saddened by those results.

Russian Energy No Menace to America

Russia's great Trans-Siberian Railway, then, which is the most apparent and striking example of present Russian effort, should not alarm us. To the thoughtful mind, seeking new fields for American enterprise, the employment of American capital and markets for the product of American labor, that railway might well be built at our expense, for the benefit of American commerce alone. But when it is finished, will it not be the commercial highway by which Russia will ship her goods into China and the far East? Yes. But not now. Not for some decades yet; for Russia has not the factories, the mills, the machinery with which to supply her own population. She will have in a hundred years—perhaps fifty years—but in the meantime the Siberian Railway, from the viewpoint of American commerce, is merely the channel by which American goods, clothing, implements, machinery, rails, engines and practically all the products of our manufactories, mines and farms will find their way to the Siberian people. So that this railway, which is but a repetition by the Russian Government of the achievements by which American private enterprise has belted our own continent with many similar trunk lines, is for the present, at least, merely another American commercial opportunity.

If it is objected that the completion of this railway and the general progress of Russian development will bring her all the earlier into final competition with us, the answer is that the Russian progress cannot be stayed by our dissent. The Siberian Railway will be, is being, completed. New provinces will be, are being, added to the empire. Seaports have been, are being, and still others will be, acquired by the government of the Czar. We cannot stop it. No power can stop it. It is as inevitable as our own development; and it is profitless to argue about it — weak and absurd to complain of it. The wise and strong thing to do is to take advantage of it. For many years many of the wants of the Russian people must be supplied from without. I have suggested the reason why other nations are not in so good position as the American Republic to supply those wants. While the opportunity exists there, nay, while it invites us, it would be the very insanity of jealousy not to avail ourselves of it.

It must be remembered that the wants of the Russian people will increase as their progress increases. The civilized man (as the word civilized is now understood) means the man with the most wants. When a railroad has once penetrated to a previously isolated section of the world, the wants, the desires, the necessities of the people of that section immensely increase.

Commercial Duties that Await Us in Russia

The Trans-Siberian Railway is the largest material fact — or rather, perhaps, suggestion — in the world to-day, except our own recent acquisitions of territory. It is the beginning of a development of a mighty people and a mighty physical empire. Within the lives of the next generation railways will penetrate every portion of European Russia; and branch lines will extend, like nerves from the spinal cord, on either side of the Trans-Siberian line to the fields and mines and forests of that great dominion of Asiatic Russia. It appears to me that here is a new field for American enterprise which that fortunate series of circumstances that is now blessing us makes almost exclusively ours. Next to the immense trade of the Orient it is our most obvious and easy market; and since it is our business to find work for our hands to do — constructive, developing work — it would appear that the commercial conquest of Russia is an opportunity so great as to become almost a commercial duty.

There are three great and new fields for American enterprise — three great and new markets for our products. One is Central and South America; another is the far East, and especially China; the third is the Russian Empire. Instead of wasting time upon non-constructive theories, we should bend every energy of inventive and practical statesmanship toward commercial supremacy in these three fields. So much has been said concerning the Oriental market that awaits us and, though not recently, concerning the South and Central American markets which should be ours, that extended reference to any one would be out of proportion in this paper. But, singularly, little attention seems to have been given to the great Russian opportunity for the investment of American capital and the sale of American goods, and, in short, the conquest by American thought and energy of the great Russian market. Has not the time arrived to give this vital opportunity our earnest attention? To occupy this field does not mean that we shall leave our other European markets. We have those markets, and they should be fostered as carefully as any merchant would nurture the trade which he has once secured. And, in the nature of things, the European markets which we now possess must continue to be ours; although, aside from markets for breadstuffs, these markets must continue to be ours in a comparatively decreasing degree. In all manufactured goods, England and the countries of Western Europe will more and more make for themselves all they need. It is to the new fields that the American people and, as their agent, the American statesman must look. And of these new fields, the three that are ours by natural conditions and all the other circumstances that create and foster commercial intercourse, are the countries of the American continent, of the far East and of the great developing Russian world.

This conquest of Russian markets is not material alone. It has its aspect of glory as well. Perhaps it is the latter to which the historian of a thousand years from now, tracing out the influence of the American people in their great world-work, will give the most, if not exclusive, attention. For it is so very simple and plain a fact that its very simplicity obscures it, that a conquest of markets means, in the end, a conquest of ideas as well. Where our merchants go our speech goes, our manners are grafted, our civilization takes root. The very act of selling produces a dominating influence over the mind of the purchaser — otherwise he would not buy. Civilization follows commerce; liberty follows commerce, too. Civilization began when people began to exchange their mutual products and possessions. Men cannot exchange their products without exchanging their ideas, and so it may be that the American commercial conquest of Russia will also be the conquest of American ideas, manners, and, in the very distant end, perhaps American institutions among the Russian people. Or will you have it that, conversely, it may be in the end the triumph of Russian ideas, manners and institutions over us? I answer that such a result is impossible, unless Russian ideas, manners and government are the superior type. For nothing is surer than this, that the fittest type in manners, laws, ideas and government will finally survive. The law of evolution is much more apparent in the intellectual world than it is in the material world.

The Progressive Instinct of the Russian People

I have never been impressed with the idea which seems to oppress or gladden many minds that the Russian Government was destined to crumble and finally disappear — perhaps, as some writers have suggested, in a second "terror," surpassing the awful days of the French Revolution. Such talk appears to me to be wild, absurd, ill-informed. There is nothing more interesting or useful at present for Americans than the study of Russia, Russian history and government. The Russian Government is singularly elastic, remarkably progressive. The aspirations of the Russian people, as a people, are obeyed and realized by the Russian Government with remarkable fidelity. It was a great Russian financier who is reported recently to have uttered this significant truth.

"No," said he, "the Siberian Railway does not pay along the entire line, and perhaps will not pay for some time, although all other Russian railways pay heavily. But Siberia must be developed before that greatest railway of the world returns dividends upon its whole length, and when that occurs it will be the best paying property in the world. The development of Siberia is a great work — a hard work." (Even the Siberian Railway is said to be profitable on certain divisions now.) "Our whole development toward the Pacific is arduous and expensive. Neither this generation nor the next will reap the greatest benefit from that. Why, then, are we doing all this? We are doing it because we cannot help it. We are doing it in obedience to an instinct of the Russian people. We are obeying the common thought and common determination of the millions; or rather, I should not say their common thought, but their common instinct. We are moved as by the voice upon the face of the waters; we are moved as you are moved, and by the same great elemental power. In a word, we are growing. We are making ready a home for our future tens of millions. We are getting in touch with the world of to-day and the world of to-morrow also."

"Russia will be your great competitor in a few years. That is the conclusion of the whole syllogism of her progress toward the Pacific. That is the meaning of Port Arthur, of the Siberian Railway, of her movement toward the Persian Gulf. It is merely the movement of her people for the opportunities of trade, to create, to construct, to do. Your expansion, which is much more rapid than Russia's, is the same thing. Do you not see, therefore, that every step of Russian progress in the far East brings your final great competitor closer to you?" Thus spoke the ablest English financier in the far East; and one cannot quarrel with the sense and truth of his words. But admitting their correctness does not negative the plain fact of our commercial opportunity, involved in that very development of Russia, so far, at least, as the present and the next few decades are concerned. Will refusal to trade with Russia retard her progress appreciably? And if we do not trade with her, will not others? And if wealth is to be drawn from this commercial course, why should we not absorb it? And if we acquire wealth, strength, commercial greatness from this source, shall we not have been strengthened for the final conflict which some think they perceive, even by the very antagonist they fear?

Why Russia Will Avoid a Conflict

"What are you going to do," said my English friend in Hongkong, "when finally you and Russia are face to face as serious competitors in the far Eastern market?" The answer is that it is a situation which will take care of itself when it arrives. I have long had my own ideas as to what will occur; but it is not fruitful to discuss any situation so far in the future that we can neither act upon it nor prepare in a definite and tangible way for it. To go to war to protect commercial rights is not a shocking proposition; but to undertake conflict where the struggle itself would destroy the trade advantages which are yours under peaceful conditions is an impossible thought. It may be that other nations may invite and finally compel such a conflict with Russia. But there is nothing in the present situation to indicate that Americans will become involved in any such controversy for several generations at least, if ever; and the conflicts of others are something with which we have nothing to do except as those conflicts may affect our rights, present or prospective. I hardly look, however, for armed conflict between Russia and any power whatever for a very long time to come.

The remark of the Russian naval officer in Nagasaki harbor is the expression of all Russian thought, and one might say of all intelligent people everywhere on this subject. Russia is developing, growing. She needs her money for railways, for naval stations, for ships, for development, and has none for war.

The Argument for Commercial Conquest

All this theory of trade opportunities is "cold-blooded," we are told. One sometimes even hears it called "sordid." It is a matter of no importance to the ongoing of the American people whether these unkind adjectives are applicable or not. It is our business to find employment for every American. It is our business to discover new fields which the American mind and progress may enter and develop. It is our business to keep our productive energies active. It is our business to keep alive the constructive tendencies of the American people. In a word, it is our business to preserve our national youth — to keep growing in wealth, in power and in that kind of civilization which does not also mean decay. There are many offensive things about the ruggedness of Philistinism, but at least it has virility and perpetuity. It will not be a fortunate day for this virile republic when the bold spirit of our pioneers, who explored our continent and established our empire even in the wilderness, the audacity of our great constructive minds who have built our railroads, finished our bridges, launched our ships, and all our masculine, daring and synthetic character, is succeeded by the merely interrogative intellect, by a disposition to introspection, or even by the refined methods of art — for the ethnologist has pointed out for so many centuries that art is the beautiful flower that springs from the soil of decay, that that proposition may be taken now as res adjudicata; and one must be excused for preferring life, even if it is rugged, even if it is a selfish life, rather than death, no matter how beautiful.

How the Eternal Analogy Holds

There is no disputing the theory of progress by the law of rhythms. Olive Schreiner never said anything half so great as that "the Eternal analogy holds." Human progress is by mighty impulses, just as is everything else in Nature. And human progress, by impulses instead of by a steady and continuous current, takes the form of the predominance, the sovereignty, the mastery of successive peoples during successive periods. A mere glance at history suggests this; careful study confirms it. It is this period of mastery, of dominion, which the American people have reached to-day. Our whole policy as a nation should be shaped from the viewpoint of this great truth. The whole problem of our statesmanship, largely considered, is to extend this period — to render it permanent, if, such a glad dream were possible, and let us not deny that it is.

England's sagacity during the past seventy-five years in these lines commands the admiration of her bitterest enemy; and it is this which has made her great, and which has kept her young. It will be a departure from these lines which will mark the beginning of her decline. Fortune has favored us in these great material particulars in a manner that compels a belief that it is the purpose of Providence to make us the master people of the world for a long period immediately before us. One cannot stop to quarrel or argue with him who holds the other view. It is like arguing against the coming of spring, or the ripening of corn in summer. It is like quarreling with the progresses of the suns. It is like — nay it is — disputing with a fact — and who can dispute successfully with facts? Our productive energies are unequaled in the history of the world; this is merely a fact. Our geographical position between the two great oceans is imperial beyond that of any other country on earth; that is merely a fact. The possession of Puerto Rico, the canal, Hawaii, the Philippines gives us a series of bases — commercial, naval and military — equaled only by two or three of the choice positions held by England; this is merely a fact. In politics we are through with childhood; through with petty disputations about State rights, about fanciful standards of money, about paralytic feebleness under the Constitution. These as practical questions are in the past, and the American people have reached that stage in their evolution where they are a Nation, a consolidated, indivisible People — a great, single, human Power; all this is merely a fact. In short, we have at last got ready for our work — and our work awaits us; it will continue to develop before us as our capacity for doing it develops, until our period as the sovereign people of the world has ended. "Yes, I think undoubtedly that you Americans will control things for the next three hundred years, perhaps five hundred years," as the Russian officer said in the beautiful harbor of South Japan. The American people think so, too, and it will be our business to make that five hundred years a thousand.

There is nothing discouraging in this program to the devotee of mere ideals. Ideals are nothing unless they are effectuated, and it has been pointed out before that ideals and ideas are not extended merely by talking about them. Nature has its methods of the propaganda of civilization. It is by the great and simple methods of growth. It is by making two blades of grass grow where one grew before. It is by the planting of trees, the building of roads, the setting of ships upon the waters, the manufacture of things of human use. It is by carrying merchandise to the peoples who need it. It is by the great law of service, for with these things go our thought, our speech, our religion, our institutions. "Faith without works is dead," and it is written that, "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God."

THERE are two sorts of men as gets henpecked," remarked Henry—I forget how the subject had originated, but we had been discussing the merits of Henry VIII considered as a father and a husband—"the sort as likes it and the sort as don't, and I wouldn't be too cocksure that the sort as does isn't on the whole in the majority.

"You see," continued Henry argumentatively, "it gives, as it were, a kind of interest to life, which nowadays, with everything going smoothly, and no chance of a row anywhere except in your own house, is apt to become a bit monotonous. There was a chap I got to know pretty well, one winter when I was working in Dresden at the Europaischer Hof; a quiet, weak little man he was, a journeyman butcher by trade; and his wife was a dressmaker, a Schneiderin, as they call them over there, and ran a fairly big business in the Praguer Strasse.

"I've always been told that German husbands are the worst going, treating their wives like slaves, or at best as mere upper servants. But my experience is that human nature don't alter so much according to distance from London as we fancy it does, and that husbands have their troubles same as wives all the world over. Anyhow, I've come across a German husband or two as didn't carry about with him any sign of the slave driver such as you might notice, at all events, not in his own house; and I know for a fact that Meister Anton, which was the name of the chap I'm telling you about, couldn't have been much worse off, not even if he'd been an Englishman born and bred. There were no children to occupy her mind, so she just devoted herself to him and the work-girls, and made things hum, as they say in America, for all of them. As for the girls, they got away at six in the evening, and not many of them stopped more than the first month. But the old man, not being able to give notice, had to put up with an average of eighteen hours a day of it. And even when, as was sometimes the case, he managed to get away for an hour or two in the evening for a quiet talk with a few of us over a glass of beer, he could never be quite happy, thinking of what was accumulating for him at home.

"Of course everybody as knew him knew of his troubles—for a scolding wife ain't the sort of thing as can be hid under a bushel—and was sorry for him, he being as amiable and good-tempered a fellow as ever lived, and most of us spent our time with him advising him for his good. Some of the more ardent would give him recipes for managing her, but they being, generally speaking, bachelors their suggestions lacked practicability, as you may say. One man bored his life out persuading him to try a bucket of cold water; he was one of those cold-water enthusiasts, this fellow; took it himself for everything, and always went to a hydropathic establishment for his holidays. Rumor had it that Meister Anton really did try this experiment on one unfortunate occasion—worried into it, I suppose, by the other chap's persistency. Anyhow, we didn't see him again for a week, he being confined to his bed with a chill on the liver. And the next suggestion made to him he rejected quite huffily, explaining that he had no intention of putting any fresh ideas into his wife's head.

"She wasn't a bad woman, mind you—merely given to fits of temper. At times she could be quite pleasant; but when she wasn't, life with her must have been exciting. He had stood it for about seven years; and then one day, without a word of warning to any one, he went away and left her. As she was quite able to keep herself, this seemed to be the best arrangement possible and everybody wondered why he had never thought of it before. I did not see him again for nine months, until I ran against him by pure chance on the Köln platform, where I was waiting for a train to Paris. He told me they had made up all their differences by correspondence and that he was then on his way back to her. He seemed quite cheerful and expectant.

"'Do you think she's really reformed?' I says. 'Do you think nine months is long enough to have taught her a lesson?' I didn't want to damp him, but personally I have never known but one case of a woman being cured of nagging, and that being brought about by a fall from a third-story window, resulting in what the doctors called permanent paralysis of the vocal organs, can hardly be taken as a precedent.

"'No,' he answered, 'nor nine years. But it's been long enough to teach me a lesson.'

"'You know me,' he goes on. 'I ain't a quarrelsome sort of chap. If nobody says a word to me, I never says a word to anybody, and it's been like that ever since I left her, day in, day out, all just the same. Up in the morning, do your bit of work, drink your glass of beer and to bed in the evening; nothing to excite you, nothing to arouse you. Why, it's a mere animal existence.' He was a rum sort of chap; always thought things out from his own point of view, as it were."

"Yes, a curious case," I remarked to Henry; "not the sort of story to put about, however. It might give women the idea that nagging is attractive and encourage them to try it upon husbands who do not care for excitement."

"Not much fear of that," replied Henry. "The nagging woman is born, as they say, not made, and she'll nag like the roses bloom, not because she wants to, but because she can't help it. And a woman to whom it don't come natural will never be any real good at it, try as she may. And as for the men, why we'll just go on selecting wives according to the old rule, so that you never know what you've got till it's too late for you to do anything but make the best or the worst of it, according as your fancy takes you.

"There was a fellow," continued Henry, "as used to work with me, a good many years ago now, at a small hotel in the city. He was a waiter, like myself—not a bad sort of chap, though a bit of a toff in his off-hours. He'd been engaged for some two or three years to one of the chambermaids. A pretty, gentle-looking little thing she was, with big, childish eyes and a voice like the pouring out of water. They are strange things, women; one can never tell what they are made of from the taste of them. And while I was there, it having been a good season for both of them, they thought they'd risk it and get married. They did the sensible thing, he coming back to his work after the week's holiday and she to hers; the only difference being that they took a couple of rooms of their own and slept out, in Middleton Row, from where in summer time you can catch the glimpse of a green tree or two.

"HE WAS SHOCKED TO FIND THAT HER SIZE IN GLOVES WAS SEVEN-AND-A-QUARTER"

"The first few months they were as happy as a couple in a play, she thinking almost as much of him as he thought of himself, which must have been a comfort to both of them, and he as proud of her as if he made her himself. And then some fifteenth cousin or so of his, a man he never heard of before, died in New Zealand and left him a fortune.

"That was the beginning of his troubles and of hers, too. I don't say it was enough to buy a peerage, but to a man accustomed to dream of half-crown tips it seemed an enormous fortune. Anyhow, it was sufficient to turn his head and give him ideas above his station. His first move, of course, was to chuck his berth and set fire to his dress suit, which, being tolerably greasy, burned well. Had he stopped there nobody could have blamed him. I've often thought myself that I would willingly give ten years of my life, provided anybody wanted them, which I don't see how they should, to put my own behind the fire. But he didn't. He took a house in a mews, with the front door in a street off Grosvenor Square, furnished it like a second-class German restaurant, dressed himself like a bookmaker, and fancied that with the help of a few shady City chaps and a broken-down swell or two he had gathered around him, that he was fairly on his way to Park Lane and the House of Lords.

"And the only thing that struck him as being at all in his way was his wife. In her cap and apron, or her Sunday print, she had always looked as dainty and fetching a little piece of goods as a man could wish to be seen out with. Dressed according to the advice of his new-found friends, of course she looked like nothing else so much as a barn-yard chicken in the costume of a red Indian chief. He was shocked to find that her size in gloves was seven-and-a-quarter, and in boots, something over five; and that sort of thing naturally irritates a woman more even than finding fault with her immortal soul. I guess for about a year he made her life pretty well a burden for her, trying to bring her up to the standard of the Saturday-to-Monday-at-Brighton set with which he had surrounded himself, or which, to speak more correctly, had got around him. She'd a precious sight more gumption than he had ever possessed, and if he had listened to her instead of insisting upon her listening to him it would have been better for him. But there are some men who think that if you have a taste for champagne and the ballet, that proves you are intended by Nature for a nob, and he was one of them; and any common-sense suggestion of hers only convinced him of her natural unfitness for an exalted station.

"He grumbled at her accent, which, seeing that his own was acquired in Limehouse and finished off in the Minories, was just the sort of thing a fool would do. And he insisted on her reading all the society novels as they came out—you know the sort I mean—where everybody snaps everybody else's head off and all the proverbs are upside down; people leave them about the hotels when they've done with them, and one gets into the habit of dipping into them when one's nothing better to do. His hope was that she might, with pains, get to talk like these books. That was his ideal.

"She did her best, but, of course, the more away she got from herself the more absurd she became, and the rubbish and worse that he had about him would ridicule her more or less openly. And he, instead of kicking them out into the mews—which could have been done easily without Grosvenor Square knowing anything about it, and thereby having its high-class feelings hurt—he would blame her when they had all gone, just as if it was her fault that she was the daughter of a respectable bootmaker in the Mile End Road instead of something more likely than not turned out of the third row of the ballet because it couldn't dance and didn't want to learn.

"He played a bit in the city, and won at first; and that swelled his head worse than ever. It also brought him a good deal of sympathy from an Italian Countess, the sort you find at Homburg, and that, generally speaking, is a widow. Her chief sorrow was for society—that in him was losing an ornament. She explained to him how an accomplished and experienced woman could help a man to gain admittance into the tip-top circles which, according to her, were just thirsting for him. As a waiter he had his share of brains, and it's a business that requires more insight than perhaps you'd fancy, if you don't want to waste your time on a rabbit-skin coat and a paste ring, and give the burnt sole to the real gent. But in the hands of this swell mob he was, of course, just the young man from the country; and the end of it was that he played the game down pretty low.

"She—not the Countess; I shouldn't like you to have that idea, but his wife—came to be pretty friendly with my missis later, and that's how I got to know the details. He comes to her one day looking pretty sheepish-like, as one can well believe, and maybe he'd been drinking a bit to give himself courage.

"'We ain't been getting along too well together of late, have we, Susan?' says he.

"'We ain't seen much of one another,' she answers; 'but I agree with you—we don't seem to enjoy it much when we do.'

"'It ain't your fault,' says he.

"'I'm glad you think that,' she answers; 'it shows me you ain't quite as foolish as I was beginning to think you.'

"'Of course, I didn't know when I married you,' he goes on, 'as I was going to come into this money.'

"'No, nor I either,' says she, 'or you bet it wouldn't have happened.'

"'It seems to have been a bit of a mistake,' says he, 'as things have turned out.'

"'It would have been a mistake, and more than a bit of a one in any case,' answers she.

"'I'm glad you agree with me,' says he; 'there'll be no need to quarrel.'

"'I've always tried to agree with you,' says she. 'We've never quarreled yet, and that ought to be sufficient proof to you that we never shall.'

"'It's a mistake that can be rectified,' says he, 'if you are sensible, and that without any harm to any one.'

"'Oh!' says she, 'it must be a new sort of mistake, that kind.'

"'We're not fitted for one another,' says he.

"'Out with it,' says she. 'Don't you be afraid of my feelings; they are well under control, as I think I can fairly say by this time.'

"'With a man in your own station of life,' says he, 'you'd be happier.'

"'There's many men I might be happier with,' replies she. 'That ain't the thing to be discussed, seeing as I've got you.'

"'You might get rid of me,' says he.

"'You mean, you might get rid of me,' she answers.

"'It comes to the same thing,' he says.

"'No, it don't,' she replies, 'nor anything like it. I shouldn't have got rid of you for my pleasure and I'm not going to do it for yours. You can live like a decent man and I'll go on putting up with you; or you can live like a fool and I shan't stand in your way. But you can't do both, and I'm not going to help you try.'

"Well, he argued with her and he tried the coaxing dodge and he tried the bullying dodge, but it didn't work, neither of it.

"'I've done my duty by you,' says she, 'so far as I've been able, and that I'll go on doing or not, just as you please; but I don't do more.'

"'We can't go on living like this,' says he, 'and it isn't fair to ask me to. You're hampering my prospects.'

"'I don't want to do that,' says she. 'You take your proper position in society, whatever that may be, and I'll take mine. I'll be glad enough to get back to it, you may rest assured.'

"'What do you mean?' says he.

"'It's simple enough,' she answers. 'I was earning my living before I married you and I can earn it again. You go your way, I go mine.'

'It didn't satisfy him, but there was nothing else to be done, and there was no moving her now in any other direction whatever, even had he wanted to. He offered her anything in the way of money—he wasn't a mean chap—but she wouldn't touch a penny. She had kept her old clothes—I'm not sure that some idea of needing them hadn't always been in her head—applied for a place under her former manager, who was then bossing a hotel in Kensington, and got it. And there was an end of high life so far as she was concerned.

"As for him, he went the usual way. It always seems to me as if men and women were just like water; sooner or later they get back to the level from which they started, that is, of course, generally speaking. Here and there a drop clings where it climbs; but, taking them on the whole, pumping up is a slow business. Lord! I have seen them, many of them, jolly clever they've thought themselves, with their diamond rings and big cigars. 'Wait a bit,' I've always said to myself, 'there'll come a day when you'll walk in and be glad enough of your chop and potatoes again with your half-pint of bitter.' And nine cases out of ten I've been right. James Wrench followed the course of the majority, only a little more so; tried to do others a precious sight sharper than himself and got done; tried a dozen times to scramble up again, each time coming down heavier than before, till there wasn't another spring left in him, and his only ambition victuals. Then, of course, he thought of his wife—it's a wonderful domesticator, ill luck—and wondered what she was doing.

"Fortunately for him, she'd been doing well. Her father died and left her a bit, just a couple of hundred or so, and with this and her own savings she'd started with a small inn in a growing town and had sold out again three years later at four times what she paid for it. She had done even better than that for herself. She had developed a talent for cooking that was a settled income in itself, and at this time was running a small hotel in Brighton, and making it pay to a tune that would have made the shareholders of some of its bigger rivals a bit envious could they have known.

"He came to me, having found out, I don't know how—necessity smartens the wits, I suppose—that my missis still kept up a sort of friendship with her, and begged me to try and arrange a meeting between them, which I did, though I told him frankly that from what I knew his welcome wouldn't be much more enthusiastic than what he'd any right to expect. But he was always of a sanguine disposition; and borrowing his fare and an old greatcoat of mine he started off, evidently thinking that all his troubles were over.

"But they weren't exactly. The Married Women's Property Act has altered things a bit, and Master James found himself greeted without any suggestion of tenderness by a businesslike woman of thirty-six or thereabouts, and told to wait in the room behind the bar till she could find time to talk to him.

"She kept him waiting there for three-quarters of an hour, just sufficient time to take the side out of him; and then she walks in and closes the door behind her.

"'I'd say you hadn't changed hardly a day, Susan,' says he, 'if it wasn't that you'd grown handsomer than ever.'

"I guess he'd been turning that over in his mind during the three-quarters of an hour. It was his fancy that he knew a bit about women.

"'My name's Mrs. Wrench,' says she; 'and if you'll take your hat off and stand up while I'm talking to you it will be more what I'm accustomed to.'

"Well, that staggered him a bit; but there didn't seem anything else to be done, so he just made as if he thought it funny, though I doubt if at the time he saw the full humor of it.

"'And now, what do you want?' says she, seating herself in front of her desk and leaving him standing first on one leg and then on the other, twiddling his hat in his hands.

"'I've been a bad husband to you, Susan,' begins he.

"'I could have told you that,' she answers. 'What I asked you was what you wanted.'

"'I want for us to let bygones be bygones,' says he.

"'That's quite my own idea,' says she, 'and if you don't allude to the past, I sha'n't.'

"'You're an angel, Susan,' says he.

"'I've told you once,' answers she, 'that my name's Mrs. Wrench. I'm Susan to my friends, not to every broken-down tramp looking for a job.'

"'Ain't I your husband?' says he, trying a bit of dignity.

"She got up and took a glance through the glass door to see that nobody was there to overhear her.

"'For the first and last time,' says she, 'let you and I understand one another. I've been eleven years without a husband, and I've got used to it. I don't feel now as I want one of any kind, and if I did it wouldn't be your sort. Eleven years ago I wasn't good enough for you and now you're not good enough for me.'

"'I want to reform,' says he.

"'I want to see you do it,' says she.

"'Give me a chance,' says he.

"'I'm going to,' says she; 'but it's going to be my experiment this time, not yours. Eleven years ago I didn't give you satisfaction, so you turned me out of doors.'

"AIN'T I YOUR HUSBAND?" SAYS HE, TRYING A BIT OF DIGNITY

"'You went, Susan,' says he; 'you know it was your own idea.'

"'Don't you remind me too much of the circumstances,' replied she, turning on him with a look in her eyes that was probably new to him. 'I went because there wasn't room for two of us; you know that. The other kind suited you better. Now, I'm going to see whether you suit me,' and she sits herself again in her landlady's chair.

"'In what way?' says he.

"'In the way of earning your living,' says she, 'and starting on the road to becoming a decent member of society.'

"He stood for a while cogitating. 'Don't you think,' says he at last, 'as I could manage this hotel for you?'

"'Thanks,' says she; 'I'm doing that myself.'

"'What about looking to the financial side of things,' says he, 'and keeping the accounts? It's hardly your work.'

"'Nor yours either,' answers she dryly, 'judging by the way you've been keeping your own.'

"'You wouldn't like me to be head waiter, I suppose?' says he. 'It would be a bit of a come-down.'

"'You're thinking of the hotel, I presume,' says she. 'Perhaps you are right. My customers are mostly an old-fashioned class; it's probable enough they might not like you. You had better suggest something else.'

"'I could hardly be an under waiter,' says he.

"'Perhaps not,' says she; 'your manners strike me as a bit too familiar for that.'

"Then he thought he'd try sarcasm. 'Perhaps you'd fancy my being the Boots,' says he.

"'That's more reasonable,' says she. 'You couldn't do much harm there and I could keep an eye on you.'

"'You really mean that?' says he, starting to put on his dignity.

"But she cut him short by ringing the bell. 'If you think you can do better for yourself,' she says, 'there's an end of it. By a curious coincidence the place is just now vacant. I'll keep it open for you till to-morrow night; you can turn it over in your mind;' and, one of the page boys coming in, she just says, 'Good-morning,' and the interview was at an end.

"Well, he turned it over and he took the job. He thought she'd relent after the first week or two, but she didn't; he just kept that place for over fifteen months and learnt the business. In the house he was James the Boots, and she Mrs. Wrench, the landlady, and she saw to it that he didn't forget it. He had his wages and he made his tips, and the food was plentiful; but I take it he worked harder during that time than he'd ever worked before in his life, and found that a landlady is just twice as difficult to please as the strictest landlord it can be a man's misfortune to get under, and Mrs. Wrench was no exception to the rule.

"At the end of the fifteen months she sends for him into the office. He didn't want telling by this time; he just stood with his hat in his hand and waited, respectful like.

"'James,' says she, after she had finished what she was doing, 'I find I shall want another waiter for the coffee-room this season. Would you care to try the place?'

"'Thank you, Mrs. Wrench,' he answers; 'it's more what I've been used to and I think I'll be able to give satisfaction.'

"'There's no wages attached, as I suppose you know,' continues she; 'but the second floor goes with it, and if you know your business you ought to make from twenty-five to thirty shillings a week.'

"'Thank you, Mrs. Wrench; that'll suit me very well,' replies he; and it was settled.

"He did better as a waiter; he'd got it in his blood, as you might say; and so after a time he worked up to be head waiter. Now and then, of course, it came about that he found himself waiting on the very folks that he'd been chums with in his classy days, and that must have been a bit rough on him. But he'd taken in a good deal of sense since then, and when one of the old sort, all rings and shirt-front, dining there one Sunday evening, started chaffing him, Jimmy just shut him up with a quiet: 'Yes, I guess we were both a bit out of our place in those days. The difference between us now is that I have got back to mine;' which cost him his tip, but must have been a satisfaction to him.

"He worked in that hotel for some three and a half years, and then Mrs. Wrench sends for him again into the office.

"'Sit down, James,' says she.

"'Thank you, Mrs. Wrench,' says James, and sat.

"'I'm thinking of giving up this hotel, James,' says she, 'and taking another near Dover, a quiet place with just such a clientèle as I shall like. Do you care to come with me?'

"'Thank you,' says he, 'but I'm thinking, Mrs. Wrench, of making a change myself.'

"'Oh,' says she; 'I'm sorry to hear that, James. I thought we'd been getting on very well together.'

"'I've tried to do my best, Mrs. Wrench,' says he, 'and I hope as I've given satisfaction.'

"'I've nothing to complain of, James,' says she.

"'I thank you for saying it,' says he, 'and I thank you for the opportunity you gave me when I wanted it. It's been the making of me.'

"She didn't answer for about a minute. Then says she: 'You've been meeting some of your old friends, James, I'm afraid, and they've been persuading you to go back into the City.'

"'No, Mrs. Wrench,' says he; 'no more City for me and no more neighborhood of Grosvenor Square, unless it be in the way of business; and that couldn't be, of course, for a good long while to come.'

"'What do you mean by business?' asks she.

"'The hotel business,' replies he. 'I believe I know the bearings by now. I've saved a bit, thanks to you, Mrs. Wrench, and a bit's come in from the wreck that I never hoped for.'

"'Enough to start you?' asks she.

"'Not quite enough for that,' answers he. 'My idea is a small partnership.'

"'How much is it altogether?' says she, 'if it's not an impertinent question.'

"'Not at all,' answers he. 'It tots up to £900 about.'

"She turns back to her desk and goes on with her writing.

"'Dover wouldn't suit you, I suppose?' says she, without looking around.

"'Dover's all right,' says he, 'if the business is a good one.'

"'It can be worked up into one of the best things going,' says she, 'and I'm getting it dirt cheap. You can have a third share for a thousand pounds, that's just what it's costing, and owe me the other hundred.'

"'And what position do I take?' says he.

"'If you come in on those terms,' says she, 'then, of course, it's a partnership.'

"He arose and came over to her. 'Life isn't all business, Susan,' says he.

"'I've found it so mostly,' says she.

"'Fourteen years ago,' says he, 'I made the mistake; now you're making it.'

"'What mistake am I making?' says she.

"'That man's the only thing as can't learn a lesson,' says he.

"'Oh,' says she, 'and what's the lesson you've learnt?'

"'That I never get on without you, Susan,' says he.

"'Well,' says she, 'you suggested a partnership and I agreed to it. What more do you want?'

"'I want to know the name of the firm,' says he.

"'Mr. and Mrs. Wrench,' says she, turning around to him and holding out her hand. 'How will that suit you?'

"'That'll do me all right,' answers he. 'And I'll try and give satisfaction,' adds he.

"'I believe you,' says she.

"And in that way they made a fresh start, as it were."

Henry M. Stanley

The Explorer, Lecturer and Journalist as I Knew Him

By Major James B. Pond

IN THE summer of 1886, while traveling in England with Henry Ward Beecher, I was asked if I did not want Henry M. Stanley in America. I replied that Mr. Stanley had once made the attempt and had been a most dismal failure. A day or two later, when I mentioned this circumstance to Mr. Beecher, he replied:

"Stanley is one of the greatest men we have. I have been reading Through the Dark Continent; it is a great book. He is doing good work for civilization."

I arranged then to call upon Mr. Stanley at his apartments in New Bond Street and learn what his ideas were in regard to revisiting the United States. There I saw him for the first time, and found a very quiet, unassuming little man with dark hair and penetrating light blue eyes, reticent, but very pleasant. He allowed me to do the talking.

I related what I had heard Mr. Beecher say of him, and saw at once that it pleased him. It was about one o'clock. I asked him if he had lunched; he had not, so I invited him to the Café Royal, where we lunched together.

At luncheon I tried to entertain him with conversation, telling of America and the changes that had taken place during his absence. He listened attentively, but made no response; finally, in order to get him to speak, I began to put questions to him about Africa and its people. I then discovered that I had found and touched the proper key, and he was soon relating to me wonderful accounts of his adventures. When we came to separate, I remarked that there was a great American comedian playing at the Gaiety Theatre and asked if he would not like to see and hear him. He replied that he would be delighted, so the appointment was made and we occupied a box at the Gaiety together that evening in company with a young English friend of mine. Mr. Stanley seemed to enjoy the play very much, paying the closest attention until the curtain dropped.

We parted at Charing Cross, Stanley saying, "Good-night; I am indebted to you for a very enjoyable evening," and started home. I don't know why, but as he turned the first corner I hurried after him. I have never told this before and I cannot tell now why it was that I could not help following him. But he had produced a most remarkable impression upon me. I kept saying to myself: "That is Stanley! Stanley, the wonderful explorer! What a life he has had! How I would like to have shared with him his hazardous adventures! How I would like to serve such a man!"

The next morning I received the following letter from Mr. Stanley, which he must have written and mailed to me on his return from the theatre:

> "My Dear Sir: I am willing to go to America and deliver fifty lectures for you, beginning November 29 next, six lectures a week, you paying me one hundred dollars a lecture and my traveling expenses from the date of the first lecture to the close of the tour, settlements to be made weekly. In case I am recalled by the King of the Belgians, I am to be allowed to return without let or hindrance. If this proposition meets your views, you may sign and return a copy of this letter, which I send in duplicate.
> "Yours very truly,
> "Henry M. Stanley."

I at once signed a duplicate copy of the letter and then cabled to America that I had secured Stanley for a lecture tour. I returned home in October and found a number of letters and inquiries relating to the lectures.

There were representatives of the metropolitan press of America

Through the Dark Continent

When Mr. Stanley arrived in America, November 27, 1886, I had rented Chickering Hall, New York, for the first lecture of the tour. I secured Henry Ward Beecher to present Mr. Stanley, who had been interviewed fully by the reporters on his arrival. There were columns about him in all the newspapers in New York and adjoining cities.

The evening came, but tickets had gone slowly. Mr. Beecher introduced Mr. Stanley in a brief description of his remarkable career, paying a handsome tribute to his work for usefulness to mankind, and then followed the lecture entitled Through the Dark Continent. It was descriptive of his many adventures in Central Africa and proved to be thrilling and interesting in the extreme.

Mr. Beecher had prophesied correctly.

At the third lecture, given in New Haven, it became evident that Mr. Stanley would be a success. Mr. Beecher had been right. The next lecture was at Hartford. I could not get a hall or opera house, so I rented Unity Church. Here in Hartford Mr. Stanley was the guest of his friend, S. L. Clemens (Mark Twain), who presided and introduced the explorer in a characteristic address of welcome to his city and his fireside. After the lecture, returning to Mr. Clemens' home, I invited Mark to go to Boston with us on the following day and introduce Stanley, where I was sure of a great crowd. Mark said the only objection to accepting such an invitation was the "taking a feller so unawares, with no possible time to prepare a suitable, impromptu, extemporaneous speech for so important an occasion." Mr. Stanley seemed pleased with the suggestion, and as the two men were great friends the arrangement was made. As Mark and Stanley and I spent the time together after the Hartford lecture, each apparently unmindful of the coming event of the evening, the following introductory speech by Mark on that occasion will give an idea of his resources in an emergency. The humorist and the explorer walked on to the platform simultaneously—a combination such as a Boston audience has rarely met. Mark stepped to the front and introduced his friend as follows:

Mark Twain's Introduction

"Ladies and Gentlemen: If any should ask, Why is it that you are here as introducer of the lecturer? I should answer that I happened to be around and was asked to perform this function. I was quite willing to do so, and, as there was no sort of need of an introduction, anyway, it could be necessary only that some person come forward for a moment and do an unnecessary thing, and this is quite in my line. Now, to introduce so illustrious a name as Henry M. Stanley by any detail of what the man has done is clear aside from my purpose; that would be stretching the unnecessary to an unreasonable degree. When I contrast what I have achieved in my measurably brief life with what he has achieved in his possibly briefer one, the effect is to sweep utterly away the ten-story edifice of my own self-appreciation and leave nothing behind but the cellar. When you compare these achievements of his with the achievements of really great men who exist in history, the comparison, I believe, is in his favor. I am not here to disparage Columbus.

"No, I won't do that; but when you come to regard the achievements of these two men, Columbus and Stanley, from the standpoint of the difficulties they encountered, the advantage is with Stanley and against Columbus. Now, Columbus started out to discover America. Well, he didn't need to do anything at all but sit in the cabin of his ship and hold his grip and sail straight on, and America would discover itself. Here it was, barring his passage the whole length and breadth of the South American continent and he couldn't get by it. He'd got to discover it. But Stanley started out to find Doctor Livingstone, who was scattered abroad, as you may say, over the length and breadth of a vast slab of Africa as big as the United States.

"It was a blind kind of search. He was the worst scattered of men. But I will throw the weight of this introduction upon one very peculiar feature of Mr. Stanley's character, and that is his indestructible Americanism, an Americanism which he is proud of. And in this day and time, when it is the custom to ape and imitate English methods and fashion, it is like a breath of fresh air to stand in the presence of this untainted American citizen who has been caressed and complimented by half of the crowned heads of Europe; who could clothe his body from his head to his heels with the orders and decorations lavished upon him. And yet, when the untitled myriads of his own country put out their hands in welcome to him and greet him, 'Well done,' through the Congress of the United States, that is the crown that is worth all the rest to him. He is a product of institutions which exist in no other country on earth—institutions that bring out all that is best and most heroic in a man. I introduce Henry M. Stanley."

After this Boston triumph, applications by telegraph and mail came pouring in from all parts of the country. Stanley saw that he was a success and seemed pleased that his manager was on the winning side. He suggested that I might as well lay my season out for one hundred lectures, instead of fifty (singular, too, he did not suggest a rise in his fee), and so we agreed and I hurried back to New York to complete the bookings for one hundred nights. Of course, in our contract, Mr. Stanley had stipulated that in case he was recalled by the King of Belgium he was to be allowed to return without let or hindrance, but that was not expected.

Mr. Stanley was delivering his tenth lecture in Amherst, Massachusetts, on Saturday evening, November 11. I was in my office in New York writing letters. It was ten o'clock in the evening when I received the following telegram:

> "Amherst, Mass., November 11, 1886.
> "J. B. Pond, Everett House, New York.
> "Must stop lecturing. Recalled. Sail Wednesday at 4 A. M.
> "Henry M. Stanley."

All my hopes dashed to the ground in a moment. It was not the first disappointment in my life, however. I turned out my lights and retired, to try to rest and think. Stanley certainly would and must go, and no power on earth could prevent that. I determined to meet him cordially on his arrival and to lend him all the aid in my power toward getting away on so short a notice.

A dinner was given to Mr. Stanley that night at Delmonico's

On the King's Business

The next morning (Sunday, November 12) about six o'clock, Mr. Stanley arrived, and came immediately to my room in my hotel to tell me that it required every moment of his time to get ready and sail Wednesday morning by steamship Eidler at four o'clock. His decorations and valuable presents from Queen Victoria and other monarchs were at a jeweler's on exhibition. He asked me to collect them personally; he had a great deal to do. He had accepted a commission to go back to Africa at once, heading an expedition for the relief of Emin Pasha; there was no time to lose, for he must equip the expedition in the shortest possible time, as many lives were at stake.

Early in the forenoon people began to call. There were representatives of the manufacturers of firearms and every sort of equipment necessary for the work.

That evening, after a long day of consultations and dictations of correspondence in preparation for his hurried departure, after we had dined together, Mr. Stanley sat down in my office for about two hours, smoking vigorously and uttering not a word. I knew he was undergoing a severe mental struggle. He realized the hazardous risk he was taking, the deprivation and suffering incumbent on such an expedition with the chances, even the most favorable to be considered, against losing not only his own life, but the lives of many others. He finally spoke to me of the singular business he had been engaged in during the day—that of examining and getting information as to which were the most effective firearms for the destruction of human life.

There was a bulldog in his caravan which attracted the especial admiration of a Karagua chief

As his and my experience in the Indian country had been somewhat similar, he asked me if I did not think, after all, that if we had pursued wholly peaceful tactics with the Indians our Government would have been more successful with them. He was considering whether it was not best to undertake this mission across Africa with an unarmed company rather than to have the appearance of a body of armed invaders. So far as the natives were concerned, he had no misgivings, but the army of slave-hunting Arabs under the leadership of Tippo Tip were dangerous foes and must be resisted. I discovered in Mr. Stanley that night a good man, with a brave, sympathetic, tender heart. I know I felt a deep sympathy and love for him and confidence in him that has lasted ever since and will last while I live.

Saturday morning Mr. Stanley and his stenographer were at work early. People that he had set to work on Sunday were going in and out, all busy carrying out instructions or orders for such arms and equipment as he wanted and could best get in this country. I know he ordered several hundred repeating rifles and a large stock of camp equipments.

Monday night a dinner was given to Mr. Stanley at Delmonico's by his friend, Mr. Henry S. Wellcome, an American merchant residing in London. It was a delightful occasion. All who were present knew Stanley well and expressed absolute faith in the ultimate success of this the most hazardous adventure the great explorer had ever attempted. As the Eidler was to sail at the unseasonable hour of four the next morning, we proposed to see Stanley on board the ship, so there was a long evening on hand. Stanley related many incidents of his African experiences, among them a visit among the Karaguas, a large and somewhat intelligent African tribe. There was a bulldog in his caravan which attracted the especial admiration of a Karagua chief, who called attention to the fact that the white man's dog resembled his men more than the white man himself, for the dog's nose and the Karagua's noses were very much alike, and the white man and the Karagua dogs were also very much alike, both having long noses.

It was proposed that we adjourn to Madison Square Garden. We occupied two boxes and enjoyed the performance to a late hour. And as it was not in the nature of Stanley to keep his friends waiting up all night, he insisted on a separation then and there, that he might go on board the steamer. As he and I shook hands when we parted, all that he said to me was: "I owe you eighty-nine lectures which I will deliver if ever I return from Africa."

Home Again After Three Years in Africa

Stanley went to Africa; three years rolled by, during two years of which no tidings were heard of him or his expedition. Finally the news came—he had reached the goal. Since his departure for Africa I had been non-committal in all of my correspondence for Stanley. I heard that his London agent was booking dates. I was satisfied that if such were the case he was doing it without authority, for no one had had time to hear from him; besides, he was otherwise engaged. His friend, Mr. Wellcome, in London, wrote me that he was sure Stanley would not lecture, as he had his book to write, besides, he was such a hero now and was receiving so much recognition from Royalty, that he could not lecture in public, for it would be undignified. The air was full of rumors, but remembering Stanley's last words, I had not the slightest fear of these rumors.

In due time, after the explorer's arrival in Zanzibar with Emin Pasha, I received a long letter from him, telling me that he had yet to finish his book; that as soon as he got to London he would write me again. He reached there in April, 1890, after an absence of three and one-half years. Business took me to London at that time, where I arrived on May 8, 1890. Stanley was the hero of the hour and his name was on every tongue. Here let me say that at no time had I for one moment a doubt of his safe return to civilization, nor—a matter of much less moment—a single fear that when the time came he would fail me in renewing the broken lecture tour we were engaged in when he was called to take the leadership of the Emin Relief Expedition. This brief statement will serve as a key to the little comedy that followed on my arrival. It was given out that Mr. Stanley would see no one. The book, which he himself considered as his report of the Emin Expedition, was being written, and the publishers naturally were pressing for "copy." There were other reasons for speech, as was seen when the cruel and strangely sad story of The Rear Guard had not only to be published but more fully explained in its tragic features, because a concerted attack on Stanley's reputation in Great Britain was made. It came about when there was a possibility of its wrecking the lecture tour which finally grew into the most successful lecture engagement ever made in the United States.

I said nothing of all this in London, but at once called on Mr. Wellcome at his place of business there. I found him absorbed in preparations for a great dinner to be given to Henry M. Stanley by "Americans in London." He declared himself glad to see me, but regretting that he was too busy to give me any attention. I was at once informed that no one could see Stanley. He received no callers in his apartment, I was candidly told, and was so overwhelmed with letters and cards that none received attention except those under Royal seal. I must wait until June 3 and see him at the banquet, where all would have an equal chance. There was no use writing him, for he opened no letters. So I must wait and take my chances with the crowd, according to this information. At the same time, I could see no reason why I should not drop Mr. Stanley a line of congratulation and let him know I was near him. This I did.

The next morning a rap on my door and a call, "Letter, sir." "Tuck it under the door," I replied. I took my time for getting out of bed. When I did get up and opened the letter I found it was from Mr. Stanley, dated the same evening I had written him:

"34 Devere Gardens, S. W.

"DEAR MAJOR POND: I am glad to know that you are in London; come down and see me at eleven to-morrow. You will see 'Not in' on the door. Get right into the lift and come straight to my apartments. Will be glad to see you.

"HENRY M. STANLEY."

Stanley's I.O.U. for Eighty-Nine Lectures

I was in that "lift" at exactly eleven o'clock on the morning of May 14, 1890. The "lift" boy asked, "Is this Major Pond?" "Yes," I replied. "This way, please," and he opened a door. There stood Stanley; not the Stanley of three and one-half years ago. His black hair was now white. We grasped each other by the hand, and it was some time before Stanley said: "It's all right, Major. I am glad to see you. Sit down." I replied that I did not want to occupy one moment of his time. He assured me that I need not hurry. So for two hours he entertained me, relating much of his experience; how gratifying it was to return and how much he would like to accept the generous hospitality and courtesies shown him on all sides, but he had his book to finish and some engagements to dine with friends, so with the coming dinner by Americans he was filled up as far as he dared engage himself. Of course, I said nothing about lecturing in America and soon arose to bid him "Good-by." He asked for my address, which was given, but I did not see him again until the American banquet. Then he discovered me in the crowd and sent for me, and in the presence of that great crowd of hero-worshipers and banqueters, introduced me to his officers, Doctor Park, Stairs, Jephoen and Nelson, who were seated on the right and left of him.

After this first interview I thought I would call on Mr. Wellcome again. I found him still eagerly engaged in the preparations for the coming banquet. He was very cordial. I told him that I had called to see if I could ascertain any further news about our hero. He assured me that I should surely see him at the dinner; but he could give me one piece of news: Stanley was not going to lecture. I did not tell him, or any one else, that I had seen Stanley.

Business kept me fast in London until early in June. It was Friday, the sixth, when I received a telegram from Stanley at Ascott, asking me to meet him at his London apartments at five o'clock that day. I was there and he met me cordially, saying:

"Major Pond, on the twenty-fifth of September I am to be married and on the tenth of October I take a degree at Cambridge. I owe you eighty-nine lectures. It is needless for me to tell you that I have received some very fabulous offers: I show you two of them, but I conceal the signatures."

They were very dazzling. I recognized the writing of one of them. It was an offer of fifteen hundred dollars a lecture for one hundred lectures, and all expenses from London and return.

"I have no thought of accepting them. I want you to go to your hotel and put your proposition in writing, whatever you wish; do the best you can for me. Come Sunday at five o'clock and we will sign the papers. We will have a little dinner together. I will introduce you to the future Mrs. Stanley. Then you can go about your work."

I was there with the proposition made out in duplicate, and found a card on the door which read as follows:

"MAJOR: Unavoidably called away. Put the papers under the door. I will sign and return them." (No signature.)

I was disappointed, not distrustful. I had expected to meet Miss Tennant, of whom there was being so much said and written. It was a lonesome walk back to my hotel. I did not care to visit the club and did not want to talk, so I dropped into a Methodist meeting at St. James' Hall, heard the Rev. Hugh Price Hughes give a great crowd a real Calvinistic lashing, and then dined at the Café Royal, alone and gloomy and homesick. Reaching my hotel at ten o'clock I found a package in a large envelope waiting for me. It was the contract I had drawn up and left at Stanley's apartments, duly signed by Henry M. Stanley. It was for one hundred lectures, more or less, in America, to begin in New York Tuesday, November 11, 1890. Not an alteration of any kind nor a word of suggestion.

I did smile all by myself that night and the smile lingered on my face all the next day, when I called again on my friend Wellcome and told him I was going back home to America, asking him if he could possibly give me any encouragement about Stanley; he replied that he could not. "It would not do for so great a man so to disregard the general sentiment of Royalty as to condescend to lecture for money, though he might obey Royal command and speak for some charities."

The Confusion of Mr. Wellcome

I told him that I was going on Wednesday to Glasgow (the Royal Scottish Geographical Society were to dine Stanley that night, and I had received an invitation from the President, of course, at Stanley's request) and I wished he, Villiers and a few friends would dine with me at the Savoy on Tuesday. Wellcome accepted, and six of his friends and my friends had a jolly good time. During the evening Mr. Wellcome entertained us with talk about his friend Stanley. Everybody knew he was the nearest man to the hero of the hour.

During the evening Mr. Wellcome mentioned that Stanley was going to be banqueted in Glasgow. I suggested (having an invitation in my pocket) that I would like to be there. He explained how impossible it was for any one not a member to obtain an invitation or to be admitted.

After a long and to me enjoyable evening, when the gray of dawn showed itself on the Thames embankment, the party broke up. I called Mr. Wellcome to one side and in strict confidence told him that I had a contract with Stanley for an American lecture tour; that we had been frequently together; that I was going to Glasgow to the Stanley dinner. He—well, he wilted!

We grasped each other by the hand, and it was some time before Stanley said, "It's all right, Major"

MEN & WOMEN OF THE HOUR

Doctor Gladden in City Politics

Sometimes in politics the independent reformer is a great fraud, for in the course of several months or years, should he be successful in getting elected or appointed, he often develops into a fine professional office-seeker. Of course there are many exceptions to this, and certainly one of them is Dr. Washington Gladden, who is known to millions of readers for his broad and philanthropic work in literature, and to all of the city of Columbus, Ohio, by his successful pastorate of one of its famous churches. Doctor Gladden does not restrict his usefulness to the pulpit, and recently when there was a municipal election on he took part in the fight. He ran for the City Council in the richest residence ward of the city where there was a Republican majority of over five hundred in a total vote of only 2000. Although he received the indorsement of the Democratic primaries, he ran strictly as an Independent. Around his candidacy was organized a Non-Partisan Municipal Association which made a house-to-house canvass. The fight was an extremely lively one, and Doctor Gladden was elected by a majority of 76 over the regular nominee of the Republican party.

One secret of Doctor Gladden's strength in addition to his high standing as a man was his position on the street railway franchise. He claimed that the street railways of Columbus should be rechartered by the new council, and he expressed his conviction that a three-cent fare would return good remuneration upon the actual cost of the plant and equipment.

"I believe," he said, "that a straight three-cent fare—perhaps with a transfer of five cents—would pay a good interest on what the road and its equipment have actually cost." He received many votes upon this issue.

Mr. Bill Cook's Lost Opportunity

Miss Maude Adams, whose real home, Sandy-garth, is set in the midst of the woods in an exceedingly rural part of Long Island, tells this story of herself and a somewhat distant neighbor, one Bill Cook, of whom she buys cattle, and to whom she goes for all sorts of advice pertaining to the management of her modest stock farm.

On the occasion of her first visit to Bill Cook, Bill knew no more of Miss Adams than her name, and when she expressed a desire for a second-hand wagon that she happened to see in the yard, he let her have it for the price he would have charged any one else. A day or two after, when he was standing in the door of the blacksmith's shop, Miss Adams drove by in that identical wagon, and the blacksmith, who is a reader of the daily news, looked up from his anvil and remarked:

"There goes a woman who made $100,000 in six weeks just by play-acting."

"And I let her have that good wagon for thirty-five dollars!" groaned Bill Cook.

Mr. McKinley's Democratic Secretary

George Bruce Cortelyou, Secretary to the President, is one of the most expert stenographers in the world.

He is also a musician, and he has degrees from two universities as a lawyer. In addition to this he has contributed to periodicals and newspapers, and has the respect of all classes of public men.

A curious fact in his career is that it was through Mr. Cleveland that he was transferred to the White House, his services in the Post Office Department having attracted the attention of the President. This led to his appointment as Executive Clerk, which position he filled with conspicuous success.

The position of Secretary to the Senate received official recognition when Daniel Lamont was in the White House. In reality it is of larger importance than a Cabinet position, and for this reason the title was changed and the salary was increased.

For more than a year before Mr. John Addison Porter resigned Mr. Cortelyou was practically the confidential manager to the President, and his appointment to the office followed as a matter of course.

He is very popular with the newspaper correspondents and with all others in spite of the many difficulties of the position, for hardly one out of a hundred people who call can see the President, although all the visitors think that they should have the right of an immediate interview. The other day there was a large crowd waiting in the outer room of the White House, and among these Mr. Cortelyou mingled in his diplomatic way.

Some one said, "I like Cortelyou; he is so democratic."

"Yes," drawled out a Southern journalist, "democratic in everything except his politics."

The Day Senator Platt was Talkative

Among the strong points of United States Senator Thomas Collier Platt, of New York, is his knowledge of human nature. He is seldom mistaken in a man, and this is a trait that is essential for political managers to possess. This characteristic was never better illustrated than by a transaction between the Republican "boss" and a reporter on a New York evening newspaper not long ago. Political matters were warm in the Empire State and Mr. Platt's views were in great demand. One day the city editor of this journal sent his best reporter down to interview Mr. Platt at his business office in lower Broadway. The reporter was a favorite of the Senator and he had never betrayed his confidence.

"What do you want?" the Senator asked.

"I want your views on the Brooklyn fight."

"I'm busy to-day," returned the Senator. "You know how I feel about that matter. Write a little piece about it for me and I'll stand by it. Good-by."

When the reporter got back to his office the city editor asked him what he had.

"A talk with Platt."

"Is it a good one?"

"First class. How much do you want of it?"

"Let it run," replied the city editor.

So the reporter turned out a two-column interview. The next day, uptown, the reporter met the Senator in a hotel corridor.

"I was rather talkative yesterday, wasn't I?" he said.

The Making of Governor Brady

A good many years ago John G. Brady, the present Governor of Alaska, was a little boy in New York City. At that time he possessed but one name—that of Brady—by which he was known among the other street Arabs of his neighborhood. He was a homeless, orphaned waif, who picked up a scanty living by selling papers, blacking boots and doing odd jobs about the city streets. While still a very young lad he was taken West with a carload of children like himself for distribution.

In a small town in Indiana there lived a lawyer—Judge Green—who came home to dinner one day and told his wife about the invoice of children that had just come to town. She listened with interest, and then said:

"I think we ought to take one, John." Her husband looked at her a moment.

"Do you mean it?" he asked.

"Yes; why not? We can well afford it," she replied.

"Well, then, I'll go right down before the car is taken away and pick out the toughest gamin in the lot for you."

In a little while he returned, leading a small, dirty-faced boy, who seemed to fulfill most satisfactorily the requirement he had mentioned.

That was the way John Green Brady—the boy took his patron's name—found his way into a Christian home. He went through the public grammar and high schools, and then, partly through his own efforts and partly through the kindness of Judge Green, took a course at Yale College. After his graduation he went to Sitka, Alaska, as a missionary, where he worked for several years as a preacher and teacher. Later he became a trader, but still continued to wield an influence for good with the Indians.

In appearance, Governor Brady is a strongly built man of medium height. He wears his hair and beard in a manner that reminds one of his sometime neighbor, the grizzly bear. Though he cares very little for the small amenities, there is a certain charm in his ruggedly honest manner, and all who come in contact with him realize at once the stern integrity of his character. In his missionary days he very soon won the respect and affection of the Indians, which he has never lost in his long experience as a trader and storekeeper.

Though living for so long a time on the edge of the continent, far away from his Alma Mater and all centres of literature and learning, he has kept up his intellectual life. At one time, for mere pleasure, he taught geometry to the son and daughter of a friend who was an official at Sitka; again he read Chaucer and Spenser with the beautiful woman who has long since resigned her position of Government school teacher to become his wife. Now they have a family of stalwart sons and daughters.

At present Governor Brady is bending all his efforts to induce Congress to give Alaska better laws, and his efforts in the direction of the development of our remote territory ought to meet with success, for he has shown throughout his long service in Alaska that he has the best interests of the country at heart, and is not influenced by politics.

A Fountain Built with Dimes

Anna Adams Gordon, the vice-president at large of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, was for twenty-one years private secretary to the late Frances E. Willard, and it was due to her that the beautiful Willard Fountain opposite Willard Hall, Chicago, was erected. She is a woman of tireless energy and excellent system, and she contrived a plan of dime collections from the children of the United States. It was these ten-cent pieces which paid for the fountain.

Miss Gordon was born in Boston and was educated at Mt. Holyoke College. She has written six books connected with the temperance cause to which she has devoted her life.

Mrs. Alden's Registered Trade-Mark

One of the most prolific writers of this country is Mrs. Isabella Macdonald Alden, who has written nearly one hundred books of one kind or another. The most of these are Sunday-school publications, but this year she has broadened out and has collaborated with Mrs. C. M. Livingston in a novel which is called The Way of the Wilderness. Mrs. Alden is better known to the young and old children of the country as "Pansy," and so valuable did this title become because of her various stories that it was formally registered as a trade-mark. Mrs. Alden's books have been translated into a dozen languages.

"PUBLICK OCCURRENCES"

Running for the Highest Office on Earth

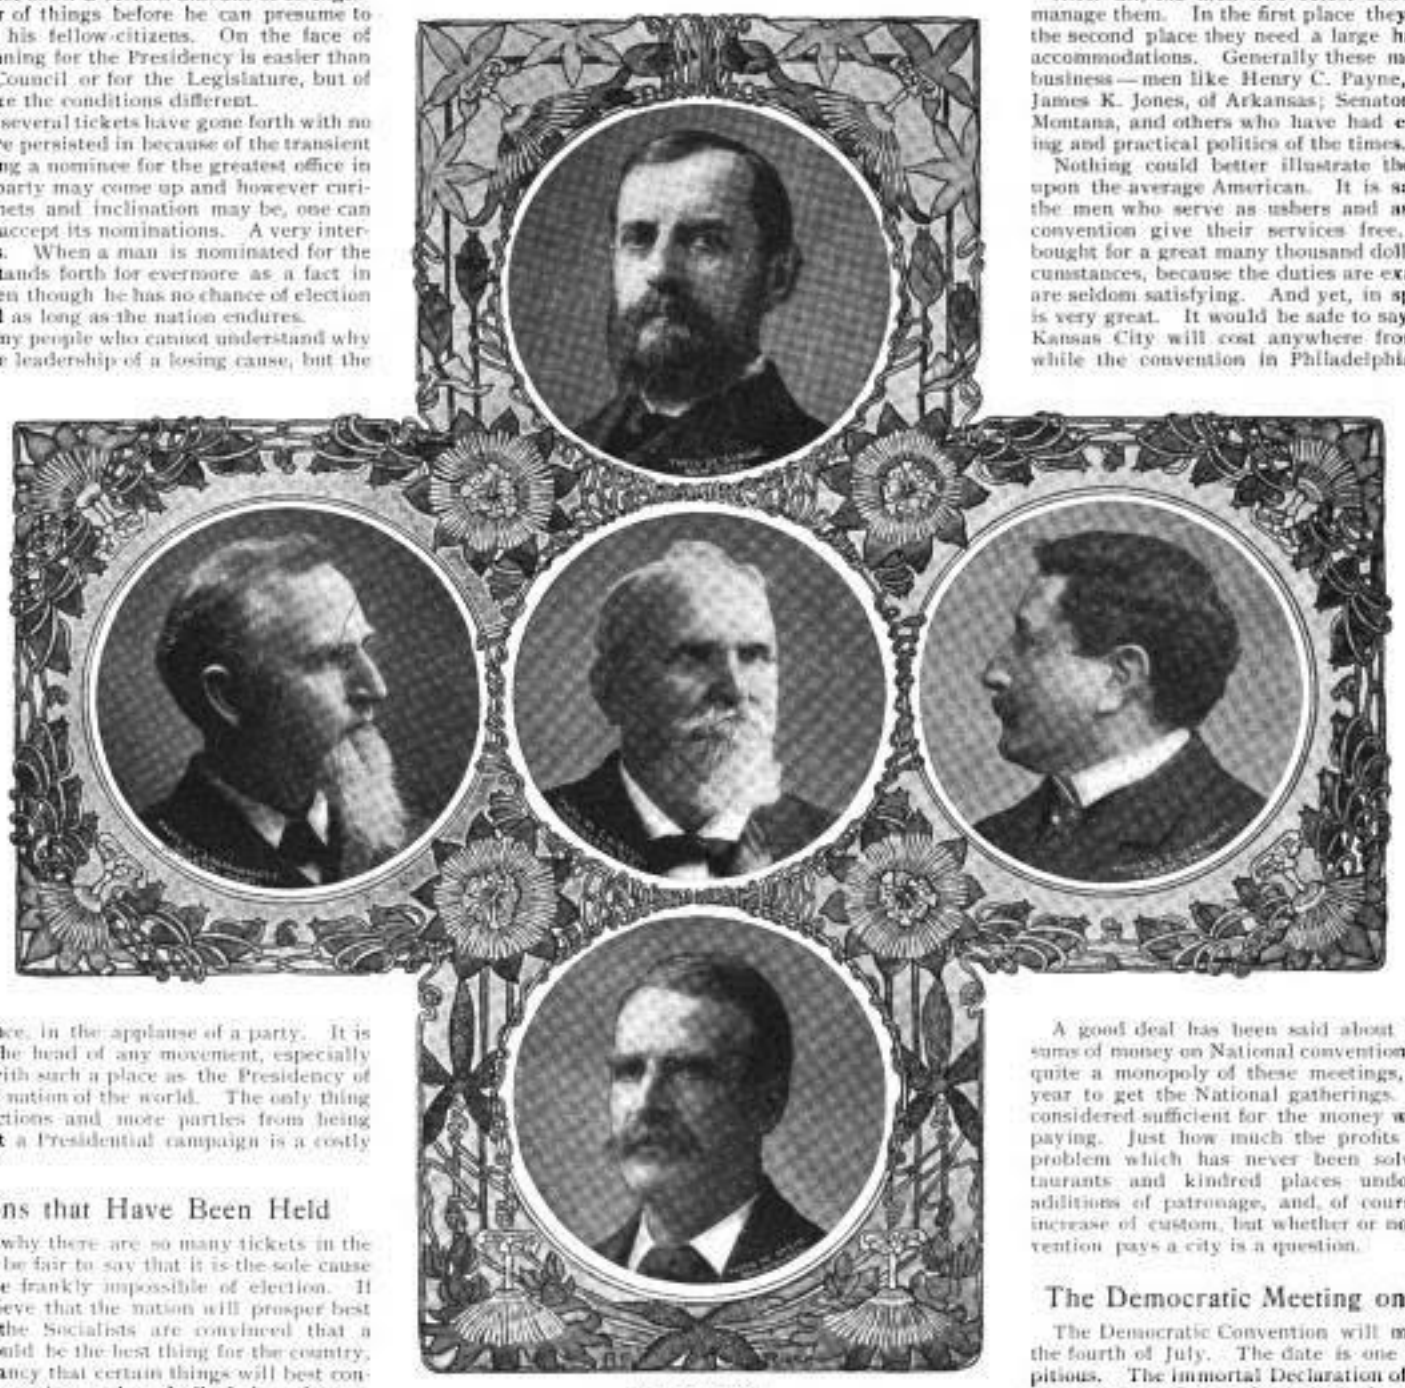
It is easier to run for President of the United States than for alderman or coroner. This is one of the peculiar facts of American politics. The Constitution throws the contest wide open to everybody who aspires to the Chief Magistracy. From the first day the boy enters the public school he is led to know that he may become President of the United States. Examples are before him. Those who slept upon the ground in the primitive log cabins, who rode the uncongenial mule along the tow-path, who hewed their way to fortune through the unfamiliar wildernesses, reached the proudest position in all the world. These instances are regularly cited in the lessons and recitations, and thus each generation is brought up to believe. Thus, too, the Presidency, as far as the election laws are concerned, has been kept as free and as wide as possible; but in local matters there has been a closing up of the side streets. The man who wishes to be mayor or alderman must possess a certain amount of property, must show a certain amount of strength, must possess a number of things before he can presume to invite the suffrages of his fellow-citizens. On the face of these circumstances running for the Presidency is easier than running for the City Council or for the Legislature, but of course other things make the conditions different.

In all recent elections several tickets have gone forth with no hope of success, but were persisted in because of the transient glory that comes of being a nominee for the greatest office in the world. Whatever party may come up and however curious and peculiar its tenets and inclination may be, one can always find two men to accept its nominations. A very interesting fact explains this. When a man is nominated for the Presidency his name stands forth for evermore as a fact in American history. Even though he has no chance of election his name is perpetuated as long as the nation endures.

There are a great many people who cannot understand why a man should accept the leadership of a losing cause, but the very person who takes a Presidential nomination of a party which is hopelessly in the minority may live in history a thousand years longer than the person of millions who laughs at him for his folly.

But this is not the full reason for the political fever which so many men catch of their own accord. It is the special glory of this country that men not only seek to achieve success in politics, but that they strive to turn their material fortunes into political eminence. Most men run for office for the glory of it. There is a fascination in the publicity, an attraction in the cheers of an audience, in the applause of a party. It is a great thing to be at the head of any movement, especially when it is connected with such a place as the Presidency of the greatest and richest nation of the world. The only thing that prevents more factions and more parties from being formed is the fact that a Presidential campaign is a costly undertaking.

The Conventions that Have Been Held



That partly explains why there are so many tickets in the field, but it would not be fair to say that it is the sole cause of nominations that are frankly impossible of election. If the Prohibitionists believe that the nation will prosper best on cold water, or if the Socialists are convinced that a division of property would be the best thing for the country, or if any body of men fancy that certain things will best conduce to the general prosperity, each and all of them have a perfect right to put forth their principles and their candidates. In such a case there is a natural struggle for leadership. There never was an organization formed or a movement started for whose honors there were not competitions. How much greater, therefore, should be the desire to lead in any part of the great Presidential contest. Even in the side shows there must be ambitions.

So far two conventions have been held—one in Sioux City nominating Mr. Bryan as the Populist candidate for President and Mr. Charles A. Towne as the candidate for Vice-President. So distinguished a Populist as Senator Pettigrew was there to superintend the proceedings. It has since been announced that Mr. Towne is ready to step down and out, and that he was placed upon the ticket as a convenient stalking horse. The other convention on the same date was at Cincinnati, when Mr. Wharton Barker was nominated for President and Mr. Ignatius Donnelly, of Minnesota, for Vice-President. These claim to be the Middle-of-the-Road Populists, and they represent the curious fact that even in the most radical of movements there are irreconcilable factions. The Sioux City Convention is a kind of adjunct to the Democratic Convention, but it is scarcely likely that many of those who took part in the Cincinnati gathering will indorse what shall be done at Kansas City in the first week of July.

The Convention's Life of Three Days

On June 19 the Republican convention will meet in Philadelphia. It is the comment of the newspapers of all parties that it will be a cut and dried affair. How far this is true remains to be seen, but if there should be no special enthusiasm, enough will have to be manufactured to keep the affair going for at least three days. That is the tacit, if not the acknowledged, agreement of all convention managers with the city in which the convention is held. Otherwise the good citizens who contribute the cash for the expenses of the affair would not be able to get their money back.

The historical interest in this country is the fact that almost the same date forty-four years ago the Republicans held their first national meeting in Philadelphia. It was not such a crowd as that which will assemble this month, not a mass of cheering thousands with music and accompaniments that involved an expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars, but a comparatively few earnest people who were organizing a new political party in the United States.

R. F. PETTIGREW
THOMAS H. CARTER JAMES K. JONES SAMUEL W. ASHBRIDGE

Abraham Lincoln was proposed for the Vice-Presidency and he received 110 votes, but Dayton got 259 and thus the man from Illinois was withdrawn. The thing that defeated Lincoln was the question all around, "Who is Abraham Lincoln?" Of course, history has answered the question, but it did not answer it quick enough in that convention to bring about his nomination. Another thing that helped to defeat Lincoln was the generally expressed doubt as to his fighting qualities. The man who proved to be the greatest war President in our history was regarded as too timid.

The Machinery of National Conventions

It seems a whole lot of noise and fun to the average person who attends a National convention. He sees the glare in the blare of it all. It is like a great big show—a wonderful circus—an impromptu exhibition of political enthusiasm, but back of it all is the keenest kind of business sense and organization. In the first place, it takes money. That is why the convention usually goes to the city which offers the most cash. Philadelphia captured the Republicans by a check for $100,000. It happened that the check did not represent much at the time, but it was banked upon local pride; and through the very vigorous and effective efforts of Mayor Ashbridge that large sum was finally collected from the citizens. Of course, after it was known that the city was committed it would not do for the people to falter, and by hard work and industry the amount was finally collected. Kansas City was a little more fortunate in that the money was all raised before the check was offered.

After all, the men who select conventions are those who manage them. In the first place they want the cash, and in the second place they need a large hall and abundant hotel accommodations. Generally these men are veterans in the business—men like Henry C. Payne, of Wisconsin; Senator James K. Jones, of Arkansas; Senator Thomas H. Carter, of Montana, and others who have had experience in the working and practical politics of the times.

Nothing could better illustrate the hold of partisanship upon the average American. It is said that practically all the men who serve as ushers and assistant managers in a convention give their services free. These could not be bought for a great many thousand dollars under ordinary circumstances, because the duties are exacting, and the returns are seldom satisfying. And yet, in spite of all this the cost is very great. It would be safe to say that the convention in Kansas City will cost anywhere from $20,000 to $30,000, while the convention in Philadelphia may be double that sum. It is the habit of the campaign committees after each contest is over to burn its records, and no man will say how much money was spent or where it was spent. There are two facts, however, which seem to be generally admitted. One is that the Republicans had a large surplus at the close of their last contest, and another is that of the $20,000 contributed by the people of Chicago for the last Democratic Convention every cent was consumed in the cost of the convention, and not a dollar reached the committee for the Presidential contest.

A good deal has been said about declining to pay large sums of money on National conventions. Chicago, which had quite a monopoly of these meetings, made little effort this year to get the National gatherings. The returns were not considered sufficient for the money which the city had been paying. Just how much the profits are to any place is a problem which has never been solved. The hotels, restaurants and kindred places undoubtedly receive large additions of patronage, and, of course, the stores have an increase of custom, but whether or not the Presidential convention pays a city is a question.

The Democratic Meeting on Jefferson's Day

The Democratic Convention will meet at Kansas City on the fourth of July. The date is one that is politically propitious. The immortal Declaration of Independence, written by Thomas Jefferson, has that as its natal day, and as he is regarded as the father of American Democracy his name will naturally play a large part in the proceedings.

Soon after Kansas City was chosen as a meeting place the splendid convention hall, which was one of the deciding features of the contest, was burned to the ground, but the spirit of the people was not hindered by such an incident. Just as soon as the ruins could be cleared another building was begun. Unfortunately there was not enough time to build the galleries of the old structure, but with judicious distribution there will be accommodations for at least 13,000 people in the new building. It is said that thousands of farmers will drive from the prairies in the old schooner wagons which are familiar in the illustrations of Western life, and political use will be made of this fact. Contrast will be drawn between the sturdy farmer who drives modestly into Kansas City and the plutocrat who rolls luxuriously in his palace car into Philadelphia. This, of course, is a part of the game of politics.

In the meanwhile it is stated that neither Mr. Bryan nor Admiral Dewey will magnetize the convention by his presence.

IT IS A SPLENDID SIGHT TO SEE THOSE GLOSSY CREATURES LEAP FROM OVERHANGING CLIFFS INTO THE WATER FULLY FIFTY FEET BELOW

How the Great New York Aquarium Was Made and Lost

From the Notes of W. C. Coup

Edited by Forrest Crissey

EVERY prominent showman has had some venture into which he has put his whole heart. Nothing in my career touched and moved me like the great New York Aquarium enterprise. Into this I not only put a fortune—more hundreds of thousands of dollars than were ever put into anything of the kind before or since—but I also invested the ambitions of my life.

I was inspired by a profound desire to promote the interests of natural science in what appeared to me its most picturesque and attractive field—the marine world; and everything concerned in this mammoth undertaking exercised a strange fascination over me. All commercialism vanished, and I was as true and devoted a student of the wonders which I had collected as was the most erudite scientist that had ever looked upon that strange assemblage of creatures from the depths of arctic and torrid oceans.

Neither money nor pains was spared to the end of maintaining an aquarium approximating that of my fondest dreams. Early in the history of this gigantic enterprise I became associated with a member of one of the great animal importing houses, a German, my partner, although I undertook the active management of the institution.

The aquarium was first opened in October, 1876, the year of the Centennial, and I think I may truthfully say that the former received as frequent mention in the press of the day as did the latter.

The Quest of the Three-Tailed Kingio

On the first opening of the New York Aquarium I exhibited a fish from Japanese waters which was no larger than a man's hand. The Japanese name of this species is kingio, and the fish is very handsome in appearance, having three perfect tails, and is so graceful in its movements that these tails resemble folds of beautiful lace. It was presented to me by a friend of mine in Baltimore, who was in the habit of spending a portion of each year in Japan. Knowing how far advanced are the Japanese in pisciculture, this gentleman succeeded in persuading me to interest myself in their methods. I soon learned that these three-tailed fishes were the result of the Japanese system of breeding, of which they alone knew the secret, and when, on investigation, I learned that their waters contain many varieties of fish of gorgeous colors, I determined to spare no expense to possess a collection from this coast, especially after I learned that even Nature itself seemed reversed there, and that there are fishes in those waters that swim on their backs.

Supplying a trusty agent with the necessary money, I first sent him to Yokohama, with letters of introduction to some friends of mine. Here, assisted by the natives, he commenced forming his collection. The captured fish were placed in a series of tanks swung from the deck of the steamer, and so arranged that a constant flow of water from a cheaply improvised reservoir should keep the fish in a healthy condition. However, the use of this device proved the inexperience of the agent, for, although the fish managed to thrive for about twenty days' time, one after another died until, on the twenty-eighth day of the voyage, on landing in San Francisco, he was obliged to wire me that not a single fish had survived the passage. My answer was: "Take the same steamer back to Japan and try again." This he did with somewhat better success, reaching San Francisco with eighteen live fish belonging to rare and beautiful species. From his description I judged that they could not be worth less than $1000 each. My hopes were high for the ultimate success of the undertaking. But my pleasure was destined to be short-lived, as my agent arrived at the Aquarium with only one living fish. The changeable climate and the overland journey had been too much for the delicate beauties from Oriental waters, and one by one they had expired, leaving "a sole survivor to tell the tale."

Just as a matter of personal curiosity I figured up the cost of this precious member of the finny tribe from far-away Japan. He cost me more than $2200 in gold. This may be scoffed at by some as a very fishy fish story, but when it is remembered that this specimen represented the outlay of two expeditions from America to Japan, including expenses for tanks, Japanese assistance, and all the ocean transportation, it will easily be realized that this statement is within reasonable limits.

Half Hours with Bashful Whales

We were equally zealous in our efforts to obtain the largest living creatures of the deep; and the fact that we exhibited live whales from the Isle Aux Condries was proof of our enterprise in this direction. Whales are timid, stupid creatures; in pursuit of small fish they run up close to the shore, and are captured by a comparatively simple method. Across the mouth of some deep bay a line of piles is driven when the water is at low tide; then the fishing fleet only awaits the arrival of a school of cetacea. These will sooner or later be seen rushing madly shoreward in pursuit of the schools of smaller fish on which they feed. When the whales are sighted the fishing vessels separate and endeavor to surround the assemblage of marine monsters. At high tide, when the line of piles is deeply submerged, the fleet crowds in toward the shore, and the frightened whales take refuge in the bay. Here they remain undisturbed, and are generally quiet until they feel the tide receding. Then they become restless, and finally make a dash for deep water, only to run against the line of piles. It would be comparatively easy for a big whale to batter a great gap in the improvised fence, and, in fact, there is frequently room enough between certain piles for him to pass through unharmed, but he is naturally timid and cowardly, and when within a yard or two of the piles, wheels about and darts back in terror toward the shore. This fruitless and exhausting manœuvre is kept up until the tide has completely gone out and he is left helpless and stranded. In all my experience in this peculiar line of live fishing I have never known a whale to break through the barrier of piles and make his escape.

A Slippery Deal in Sea-Lions

In 1870 my men captured the first seals, or "sea-lions," as we termed them. The hunters experienced no difficulty in ensnaring these creatures by means of wire nets. This observation is a most interesting one in view of the fact that later we found it impossible to procure them by this method, showing that their intuitive sense of self-protection had taught them to fear man and to avoid his devices. No sooner did we find that these curious creatures had learned wisdom from the experience of their unfortunate fellows than we set about to originate some other plan by which we might make captives.

Each of our first seals cost more than would five good specimens to-day, and they died before we could perfect our arrangements for exhibiting them. This was very discouraging, but we determined to try again, and our renewed efforts were rewarded with better success. One of the captives was an enormous creature and lived until the Fourteenth Street fire, when he was burned, together with $300,000 worth of other personal property.

Some of these monster sea-lions are very deceiving when seen in their native element and surroundings. At a little distance they do not appear larger than an ordinary Newfoundland dog, but when captured are found to weigh from twelve hundred to two thousand pounds, and to measure from thirteen to fifteen feet in length. It is a splendid sight to see these glossy creatures leap from overhanging cliffs into the water fully fifty feet below.

After our first capture there was a great demand for these animals from superintendents of zoological gardens in all the large cities of this and foreign countries. Realizing the large profits to be acquired by meeting this demand, I greatly desired to replenish our stock of sea-lions, and made an arrangement to that end with a man in California. We supplied him with all the money he required, which mounted high in the thousands of dollars by the time he had captured about three carloads of the interesting creatures. The man then came on to New York and delivered ten of the animals to us, stating that the others were en route. We at once wrote to the zoological gardens at Cincinnati and Philadelphia, offering to supply them with these rare animals. Imagine my surprise and indignation when I received answers to these communications, stating that the gardens had already procured sea-lions—from our agent! Of course we instantly made an investigation, and discovered that this crafty hunter had also supplied various European institutions with sea-lions, for the capture of which we had furnished the money. The fellow disappeared before we were thoroughly alive to the extent of the swindle which he had carried forward to such a brilliant success, and I have never seen him since. As he was a "canny Scot," he probably retired to his native heath and purchased himself a castle in the Highlands. Certainly he could easily have done this on the proceeds of his nefarious enterprise, for at that time the sea-lions commanded from $2000 to $2500 each in the European cities, and the market could not be satisfied even at that price. Take several carloads of sea-lions at these figures and the total would represent a snug little fortune.

An Eventful Monday Morning at the Aquarium

So far as I am able to learn, no enterprise of the magnitude of the New York Aquarium was ever disposed of on the flip of a penny. This transaction may not, at first thought, appeal to the church people of the country as being right, and the average business man will doubtless condemn it as unbusinesslike. The attending circumstances, however, were peculiar. This true story was never made public by my partner or myself, and the transaction always had a touch of mystery in the eyes of the showmen of the country.

From the opening of the Aquarium until a certain eventful day its success, financially, scientifically and morally, was unqualified. This, as I have already intimated, was in large measure due to the enthusiastic support of clergymen, scientists and educators, whose commendations brought us the patronage of the intelligent masses with whom these eminent leaders of thought had the greatest influence.

I received scores of letters from celebrated divines indorsing the Aquarium, and these were, of course, made use of in the way of advertising. My partner was a German and could not appreciate the American feeling for the Sabbath.

He was determined to open the doors of the museum for Sunday patronage, declaring that this would bring in a very large number of people who were naturally inclined to Sabbath-day pleasure-seeking, and were quite generally interested in things of a scientific nature. He continued this campaign of argument for two years, during which I steadfastly urged that such a step would be an offense to the belief of the majority of our patrons; that it would bring into the place an undesirable element, from which it had been entirely free, and that the enterprise was enjoying a steady prosperity with which it would be wise to remain content.

Then I repeatedly tried to buy his interest in the Aquarium, but he steadfastly refused to yield a single point, and became more imperative in his demands for Sunday opening. This persistency and increasing aggressiveness at last wore me out. One Monday morning, as he dropped in at the office and once more brought up the old contention, I determined that it should be settled, in one way or another, before he left the room. Instinctively I felt there was no use offering to purchase his interest, for I had previously gone to the limit of reason in that direction.

The Ultimate Fate of the Aquarium

Calmly and coolly I took a mental survey of the whole situation during a moment of silence between his arguments for Sunday opening. In addition to the Aquarium, we also had a joint interest in four giraffes and five small elephants. The Aquarium was worth at least half a million dollars, as it included the two acres of land at Coney Island, on which was located our storage and supply aquarium, from which the exhibition house was replenished with attractions.

Suddenly, as if waking out of a reverie, I fairly startled my partner with the exclamation:

"See here! we can never agree on this Sunday business in the world. I'll stump you to flip a penny to see which one of us shall take those giraffes and elephants as his portion and walk out of this place next Saturday night, leaving the other in full possession of all the Aquarium property."

"All right," he calmly answered, and led the way into the private office. There he drew up a brief statement embodying my proposition. We both signed it, and then I reached into my pocket and drew forth an old-fashioned copper cent.

"Heads I win, tails you win," said the German, as I poised the coin on the nail of my thumb. As I nodded assent to this I realized that not only my fortune, but the dearest dreams of my life depended upon the fall of that copper. More to me than this, however, was the thought that my wife had become intensely interested and strongly attached to this undertaking—so much so that it was her personal pride and joy. Still another consideration which flashed through my mind at that instant was the realization that if I lost it would mean months and years of the same sort of homeless wandering life that I had lived while building up the fortune invested in the Aquarium. These thoughts and many others flashed through my mind in less time than it takes to tell them. After scarcely a moment's hesitation I sent the coin spinning into the air. It dropped upon the desk, and I can now see just how the light fell upon the fateful "head" which transferred my fortune to my partner! Instantly I executed to him a bill of sale, covering my entire interest in the concern.

Americans in Paris

IT WAS in the Salles des Fêtes. They sang the Marseillaise; brass bands crashed; President Loubet and one of his Ministers made speeches; the music flared out again, and, officially at least, the Universal Exposition of 1900 was open to the world. Then the President of the Republic and his guests set out on foot to examine what they had opened. Under foot there was dust—a dust of plaster and sand and clay. M. Loubet, who walked ahead, looked like a pillar of cloud, and we followed him hopefully. Overhead the sky was cut with rafters and ladders; on either hand were huge strips of chaos, stood on end and labeled. One label read Palace of Agriculture. M. Loubet entered, turned on his heel and came back to us. We sang the Marseillaise! Inside and out that palace was naked as an eggshell. It was nothing but roof and walls and label. M. Loubet led, and always we followed, each of us (like cherubs) in his own cloud of dust. Palace after palace—naked as eggshells. At the corner of the Palace of Electricity we pricked up our ears. At last there was something. Fifty guardsmen in blue uniforms and white helmets were drawn up under an American flag that took the air bravely. As the Presidential crowd passed they dipped the colors. President Loubet took off his hat. Then the cheers began, and went ricochetting through the naked halls.

This international courtesy, unexpected as it was, made the hit of the day. Commissioner Peck's guards are all young college fellows, but Captain Bowen, their commander, they will tell you proudly, is a real cowboy. They get fifty dollars a month and glory. The good Parisians take them for heroes of other battlefields than those of football, and salute them with notable respect.

Always the procession, white now with plaster, and mired with clay, passed. We looked like wandering millers, like lost Pierrots. The national pavilions along the Seine were empty as the hollow of your hand. In the Austrian pavilion, to be sure, there were a few flowers and a strip of carpet; in that of the United States nothing—absolutely nothing under the enormous dome save one small, red-headed guardsman, who waved the Stars and Stripes with one hand, while the other was glued, rigid and military, to his white helmet. He was the Kansas City representative of "Peck's Own," and we cheered him for Kansas City, and also because he was the only exhibit that there was to cheer.

Through white ravines and on across the splendid new Alexander bridge, back to the Champs Elysées—after all, what had we seen? Merely the skeleton of an Exposition, gruesomely decorated with flags and hectic with deceptive paint.

An Arab Solution of Parisian Problems

No; the Exposition was officially "open," but it was far from being ready. You might wander there all day if you would. You might go around in the great wheel or ride along the moving sidewalk. You might watch the workingmen swarming over the huge buildings, but somehow or other this palled a bit. The first public day over 150,000 visitors passed the gates. The second day scarcely 90,000 were tempted to enter. It is wisdom to wait, always. Not until well on toward the end of May was the Exposition complete, settled and in working order.

You are not to imagine, however, that all the world has waited. Half the people you meet in trams and 'buses, boats and cafés are saying, "Oh, yes," to each other. In spite of the war the English are coming in shoals. As for the Americans, it was estimated that on April 17 there were 40,000 in Paris. Not all of them are happy. The hotels are crowded, and prices are going up, up—the visitor of the modest purse would do well to bring a hammock and swing it up between two trees in the Tuileries. The idea is not original. I got it this afternoon from a party of Arabs. They disembarked from one of the penny steamers at the Place de la Concorde. There were twenty of them; men, women and children. They wandered about aimlessly for a while and then sat down on their heels near the fountain. They drew out from under their white cloaks provisions of all sorts. There was a consultation. Then the old chief gave a gruff order. The women and children jumped up and scattered—to gather wood for a fire. They were already tearing down branches from the lilacs and young chestnut trees when the police arrived and led them I know not where. But the children of the desert were quite right. They were in the way of solving the difficulty of living in Paris during the Expositional half-year.

The Spirit of Bunker Hill at Montmartre

Of course one pays for pleasures in two ways, with money and fatigue. I overheard four Americans trying to cast up their accounts. There were two fine young lads, a mild giant of a father, and a tired, but determined little woman. What she said was:

"Who said to stop sight-seeing? Who said it? Do you mean to say that I said it?"

There were respectful murmurs from the man and the boys.

"You may have come to Paris to sit on a bench and rest, but I didn't," she added. "Don't you ever say I said to stop sight-seeing! I'd rather walk my feet off to the ankles than stop. Now come on!"

The tired little woman marched off like a grenadier and the man and the two lads followed limply. There were some English near by, who laughed; but I remarked, "My friends, that is the spirit of Bunker Hill—and Sjion-Kep"—and a very good spirit it is, too.

Admiral Schley as a Prophet of War

The invitation read:

"The President of the Republic and Madame Emile Loubet will receive at the Palace of the Elysée, Monday, April 16, at ten o'clock."

And then the name. The palace was bright with flowers and lights; everywhere officers in uniform, women trailing interminable gowns; statesmen and potentates spangled with orders; then the President, a red scarf bisecting his white shirt-front, and Madame Loubet, a motherly, dignified woman (like Mrs. Rutherford B. Hayes in her White House days). Between two dances I had found my way to the supper-room. There I saw Admiral Parrayon, hobbling a bit, for he had a touch of the gout that night.

"So Admiral Dewey is a candidate for the Presidency," he said. "Well, I wish him luck, but have you noticed that we sailormen are not often called in to take the helm of state? The General who wins a war is very liable to be made Prime Minister, or President, or something with a higher title still; but, believe me, you may count on your fingers the sailormen who have had any more substantial reward than a monument."

"Do you know Dewey?"

"No," said Admiral Parrayon, "but Schley I remember very well—there was a man!" and the Admiral shifted his weight from his gouty foot and laughed, as one who would say, a man par excellence.

"You remember when Balmaceda, that curious half-breed who might have been Napoleon, had set all South America by the ears?" he added; "well, it was then I first met Schley. I was in command of the French fleet in those waters. Almost every nation had a ship or two there, and Schley was in command of the American. The night before Balmaceda, driven to bay, killed himself, there was a dinner of the naval officers, half diplomatic and half social, it may be. Of course we all expressed ourselves on what was taking place, and, among others, Admiral Schley made a speech. I can't recall the words after all these years, but it was energetic and long, and the leit-motif was war."

Admiral Parrayon paused for a moment and eased his gouty foot by lifting it on the rung of a red velvet chair; then he added:

"But I remember one phrase Schley used a number of times. 'Every nation,' said he, 'has a war once in forty years—without a blood-letting once in forty years there seems to be no national health.'

"I turned to Schley and said: 'We've had our blood-letting; it is the turn of your United States.'

"Schley said: 'We'll have that war, sir, before our forty years of peace have expired'—and he was right," Admiral Parrayon went on. "It was a wise prophecy, or perhaps I should say, a wise reading of history. Ever since your war with Spain I have had a double admiration for my old friend—he can prophesy and fight, too. England is having her first great war in forty years."

"Whose turn will it be next, Admiral?" I asked.

"Apply Schley's rule," he replied; and, indeed, the application is not difficult.

The Cost of a Day on the Midway

At the present moment you can buy all the admission tickets you want from the hawkers in the streets, or in the tobacco-shops, for eleven cents apiece. One of these tickets will admit you during the day; after six o'clock two are demanded. This, however, is merely a first cost. The charge for visiting the special attractions—the Eiffel Tower or the Aquarium, the Harem du Rachid or the Swiss village—ranges from twenty cents to one dollar. Inchoate and unfinished as things are just now, there are already seventeen of these side-shows open. Were you to visit them all your outlay would be exactly $5.25. Even then it would hardly cover those "streets of Cairo" and outlandish "Midways" that radiate from the Trocadero. It is in this section, by the way, that the authorities have instituted a reform that may not be quite to the taste of those who amused themselves at the World's Fair in Chicago. The dances of the strange little women from Java and Egypt and Indo-China have been tamed into respectability. That this reform should have started in Paris is noteworthy. They are not wicked themselves, these good Parisians—not more than the rest of us—and very wisely they have decided that it is not their business to provide wickedness for the rest of the world—whatever the world may expect of them.

WHEREVER YOU ARE

By Madeline S. Bridges

If only I could be with you, dear, with you wherever you are,
I would not care where our feet might fare, under what sun or star
So that my hand might reach your hand, and our step keep true and sure
By any sea, or through any land, while life for us both endure.

If only I could be with you—ah, the cloudiest sky were blue!
The roughest path that the wild waste hath would be smooth, if I walked with you—
I'd stoop to drink from the running brook, I'd feed from the berry-spray,
For my soul could live on your tender look whenever it turned my way.

If only I could be with you, dear, when day is done, and the night
Comes down out of heaven, so kind and near, to fold us away from sight,
Your pillow would be my faithful breast, and when we had knelt, in prayer,
Ah, what would matter, the place of rest, so that we both were there?

Dear, I would leave a throne for you, and my kingdom's door ajar,
To seek and find you, the broad earth through, and be—wherever you are,
While the swift days fly, and the slow years die, only no more to part!
Ah, small is the world, yet wide, wide, wide, its space between heart and heart!

The Valley of Regret

By Arthur Stringer

"'IS LEGS is withered, ma'm," said the woman calmly, as she leaned over her reeking tub. "'Is legs is withered, and there ain't no 'ope for 'im, ma'm. Tell the lady, 'Enery, as 'ow there ain't no 'ope for you!"

"Yes, kind lady, my legs is withered and the doctor says as there ain't 'ope nor 'elp for me." The boy repeated it monotonously, like a lesson well learned.

"How perfectly dreadful!" sighed Mrs. Harding Sturtevant tranquilly, gazing down at the boy out of soulful brown eyes. "How perfectly dreadful!" Those eyes, for the moment at least, made Henry rather proud of his affliction. Sympathy was to him what gin had been to his forebears. But it was seldom the cup was held for him to drain.

"'E was took that way, ma'm, when we sailed from Birken'ead, nigh on seven years ago—'Enery and 'is paw and me. 'Is paw, ma'm, one of the 'andsomest men as ever you seen, though 'e would 'ave 'is drop."

The boy's mother jerked her head in the child's direction.

"But 'e's been dead this two year, ma'm," continued the woman at the tub, raising her eyes heavenward. "Drunk 'isself to death, ma'm; and wot with little 'Enery 'ere, with 'is doctorin' and 'is milk and 'is med'sen, it's 'ard, ma'm, for one poor woman!"

The figure at the tub brushed her eyes demonstratively with her soapy arm. Mrs. Sturtevant calmly murmured that it must be hard.

"But I ain't complainin,' ma'm. There's them, now, as is rollin' in money and 'as their kerriges like yourself, ma'm, beggin' your parding, as ain't 'arf as 'appy as little 'Enery there. 'Appy! W'y 'e's as 'appy as the day is long. And it's all that dawg of 'is, ma'm. That dawg is 'is life and soul!"

"Oh, yes, the dog!" said Mrs. Sturtevant. A new interest glowed in her great brown eyes. "Do tell me about that dear little dog of yours, Henry!"

"The most wonderful dawg as ever you seen, ma'm. 'E do be more than 'uman, that dawg. Whenever 'Enery is took bad, all I does is to fetch in Rags. 'Enery, 'e usually 'as 'is bad spells at night. It's 'is spine, you know, ma'm, as is all gone with the rickets, though 'is legs is took bad, too, ma'm. 'Enery, show the lady your legs."

"Perfectly dreadful. That's enough, dear," said Mrs. Sturtevant hastily. "Cover them up now or you may take cold, dear; and tell me all about that beyewteeful dog."

"'Is name is Rags," said Henry dreamily; "Rags."

"And the doctor says, ma'm, as 'e is as 'igh bred a dawg as ever wagged 'is tail—bein,' of course, if you could say as Rags 'ad a tail. Just a week gone Monday the doctor looked at little 'Enery and shook 'is 'ead and says, says 'e, 'My little man, if you 'ad one 'arf as good blood as your dawg in that little body of yourn we might build up them bones some day!' And 'is father, ma'm, as 'and some a man as ever worked on the Liverpool docks. But doctors is queer gentry. And there's them will agree with me when they've 'ad as much to do with them as me since 'Enery come."

"But may I not see this beyewteeful little dog of yours, Henry?" asked Mrs. Sturtevant softly, though a little wearily.

After looking up at her suspiciously from under his small brows for several moments the boy shook his head sullenly.

"'Enery is a little queer, ma'm, specially about Rags," the boy's mother hastened to explain. "You see, Rags was give to 'Enery by Dinney Crockett, and there is them as thinks that Dinney didn't come by 'im honest. But Dinney never stole one farthin' from this 'ouse. And I ain't one as is going to cast slurs on an honest boy. And that kind-'earted, ma'm, 'e 'as walked six miles down to Fulton Market for 'arf a dozen oysters for little [illegible] there! And sit up nights with 'im, ma'm, a doing wot 'e calls stunts for 'Enery by the hour, till 'e 'as the child a-larfing through 'is groans!"

"Didn't you know, Henry, that I have a great many very beyewteeful dogs at home? Some of them, dear, that cost hundreds of dollars. But here I have come all the way down to have a little peep at Rags, and you won't let me see him!"

Mrs. Sturtevant's intonations of sorrow did not seem to soften the boy. "'E ain't much to see, ma'm," he said nervously, looking imploringly, but fruitlessly, at his mother.

"W'y 'Enery, this kind lady don't want to take your dawg. She 'as a 'ole 'ouseful of 'em at 'ome. She 'as dawgs as took prizes and things at the dawg-shows, and some as is worth—now, about 'ow much would some of them be worth, ma'm?" asked the woman at the tub.

"Three thousand dollars," said Mrs. Sturtevant carelessly. "That's what little Lord Beresford cost me."

"Did you 'ear that, 'Enery? Three thousand dollars. And p'raps, 'Enery, this kind lady might give you a mite or two for a bit of dawg-soap. For Rags ain't 'ad a honest wash, ma'm, since 'Enery started 'aving 'is last bad spells."

Mrs. Sturtevant opened her purse. Before the child on the bed knew what she was about, not being used to such things, she had slipped a bill into his hand.

He looked at it stupidly. Then he flushed up to the temples and held it out for the woman to take back. In some way he felt that it might compromise his claim on Rags.

The woman at the tub saw the movement and stopped her work.

"'Enery!" she cried shrilly, "'Enery! don't you sit there and insult the kind lady. 'Ere! 'Enery, you 'and that to me and I'll see as it's took care of right for you. There! It's only 'is way, ma'm. 'E ain't ungrateful, but 'e's that jealous of that dawg of 'is 'e ain't right in 'is 'ead sometimes."

This might not have been the absolute truth but it served its purpose.

"Poor child," sighed Mrs. Sturtevant. She saw that it was only through the woman that she could gain her point. "He must be a great trial to you, Mrs. Hill."

"'E is, ma'm," said Mrs. Hill, showing signs of tears. She made no effort to hide the confession from the boy. He turned his thin face to the wall.

"And won't you let me see this wonderful little pet of Henry's, Mrs. Hill?" There was something like impatient command in the smiling suavity of the visitor. She was not used to being denied requests.

"In course, ma'm. You see, I 'as to keep 'im shut up under the stairs most of the time, 'e is that destructive when 'e's with 'Enery. And 'Enery, 'Eaven bless you, 'e never seems to see. As soon as Rags walks into this room 'e is on that bed and a-chewin' of the clothes like mad, 'e's that crazy with joy when 'Enery speaks to 'im. Yes, and 'Enery just sits there and lets 'im chew up a 'ole coverlet without so much as sayin' a word, 'e is that 'appy to see 'im. That's why I 'ave to keep 'im outside. One minute, ma'm, and I'll 'ave 'im 'ere."

The boy gave his mother one last imploring look. It was too late, for she had already left her tub. She went to the back door, but feeling intuitively the boy's eyes were on her, turned and faced the bed.

"Now, I don't want no nonsense, Marster 'Enery, you understand," she said in a hard voice, feeling uneasy in her own soul. "This kind lady ain't a-goin' to 'urt your dawg, and maybe as she'll do the 'andsome thing by 'im when she sees those tricks of 'is."

The woman passed out into the dark little hallway and a moment later there could be heard a number of short, sharp barks and a great deal of scratching and whining and jumping at a farther door.

Then Rags appeared. He did so by shooting in like a white and black cannon-ball. In two bounds he was on the bed beside his master. There he fell to licking the boy's hands, then he licked his cheek, then he snuggled and muzzled under his nightgown and held his impertinent little nose up in the boy's face and shrieked his shrill delight. And all the time his tail-stump waggled wildly, like a trip-hammer gone mad. And the boy stroked the terrier's nose and tickled his ribs and rubbed his ears and commenced to talk to him. Whereupon, of course, Rags began to chew the bedclothes and had to be soundly cuffed by Mrs. Hill.

Mrs. Sturtevant gazed at that dog, and she saw that what had been sung of him had all been truth. Never, indeed, had her trained eyes looked upon a finer fox-terrier.

He had the straight back and the hard, smooth, abundant coat that bespoke his breeding, plain as print. She noticed that he was flat skulled and that there was just the proper drop in the profile between the forehead and the upper jaw. He had, too, just the right deep-set, small, dark-rimmed eyes and black nose and long sloping shoulders on his tense little body to show at once what blood was in him.

Mrs. Sturtevant noticed also that Rags was white all over, save for one clear-cut spot of black that reached almost to his stump tail. He seemed nothing but muscle and hide, and so light and quick of movement that he could dance on egg-shells.

So it was no wonder Mrs. Sturtevant drew in her breath and looked with all her eyes whilst Rags, quivering with excitement, was doing his best to swallow Henry's pillow.

And Henry's mother, too, saw that which gave her an uneasy feeling. Her visitor had spoken no word, but Mrs. Hill knew what she knew.

The visitor herself had quite forgotten her surroundings, as Mrs. Hill could see by the fixed and hard expression about her mouth, though Mrs. Hill scarcely knew that the lady was saying to herself at that very moment that Rags was going to win the next Kennel Club blue ribbon. She was also thinking that Mrs. Sanderson-Cooper might scour the Continent for all the terriers she could carry across the Atlantic, yet still Mrs. Harding Sturtevant would carry off the next prize for the terrier class. Every paper in the land would proclaim her the triumphant owner,

The Grip of Honor

A Story of Paul Jones and the American Revolution

By CYRUS TOWNSEND BRADY

(Illustrated by Gibbs)

SECOND EDITION. 12mo, $1.50

The Louisville Courier-Journal says: "To be the best thing that Mr. Brady has done. Were it valuable only for the fine picture of Paul Jones that it presents it would appeal strongly to lovers of strong fiction. It has the added charm of a good story well told, for it is braided of genuine interest and told with rattling energy and ease."

"Intensely stirring descriptions of sea fights, a vivid account of the desperate encounter between the Bonhomme Richard and the Serapis and the graphic portrayal of the conflicting emotions which assail a young Irishman fighting for the American flag, who is asked to choose between love and honor, and the ignominious death of a spy and traitor, constitute some of the elements in this highly stirring romance. It is one of the most thrilling of American historical novels."—Baltimore Herald.

A Powerful Novel of American Life

Unleavened Bread

By ROBERT GRANT

12mo, $1.50

"A severe satire on the social and intellectual attempts of American women, on women's clubs on the doctrine that the American thing in life, in ideas, in material development, in social arrangements and moral progress is essentially different from and better than the Old-World thing. It is a satire on many other matters, too."—Boston Transcript.

"The contrast between Selma's words and her character is profound. Mr. Grant exploits it with merciless audacity. He leaves no foible untouched, no secret unrevealed. At the end of the book Selma, though still unconscious that her life has been despotically egotistical and ruthless, is presented to the reader with no humiliating line in her portrait missing. Not only Selma, but the three men she successively marries, and the other types included, are all realized with force; they seem taken bodily from actual life."—New York Tribune.

and her pictures would be in the Sunday supplements. Then her cup would be full.

Mrs. Harding Sturtevant was never half-hearted about a thing. Neck or nothing was her unwritten principle. When she went into an enterprise she went in to win. For five long years Mrs. Sanderson-Cooper had flaunted that Kennel Club blue ribbon in her face and harried her into spending more money on imported terriers than she ever dared tell her husband. They had never won, of course, but now she would show them! In fact, she even decided just how she should sit when being photographed with the prize-winner on her lap. The sporting papers, she knew, would put the old, old jest about Beauty and the Beast under the picture, at which, of course, she must pretend to be indignant. She smiled gently.

Then her eyes fell on Rags again, and from Rags on to Henry. The sight of the boy, something in the way in which he sat in his bed and gazed at his dog and talked to it as though it were human, pulled her up short.

"You must break your eggs before you can make your omelette" was the thought that was running through her head, when Mrs. Hill pretended to look up suddenly from her washing and, womanlike, ventured subtly but carelessly:

"Show the lady, 'Enery, as 'ow Rags can do 'is tricks."

So the little terrier was put through his tricks. First the child showed how Rags could read the paper and smoke a pipe. Then Rags was made to waltz, and put out lighted matches with his forepaws, and sing rag-time, and turn somersaults, and act drunk, and play dead, until Mrs. Hill herself left her tub and came and stood with her steaming arms akimbo, and explained how the boy had spent months and months "a-training the little critter."

Poor child! He did not dream that each new trick sealed the more inexorably the fate of his Rags, how each new exhibition placed one more stone on the wall that would separate them.

When Mrs. Sturtevant finally drew up her skirts and took her departure, she called Mrs. Hill out into the hallway after her, where a low-toned conversation took place. Just what Mrs. Sturtevant said there is no concern of ours, beyond the fact that she rustled out to her carriage indignant and disappointed. Mrs. Hill stood in the doorway tearfully but triumphantly protesting "as she darn't do it; not for five 'undred dollars!"

Before the boy's mother locked Rags up that evening she looked at Henry and then at the dog and then at Henry once more. Then she sighed heavily. In fact, she sighed several times, and, hanging out her washing some hours later, she said to herself "as 'ow it was a 'ard world."

But Mrs. Sturtevant could afford to wait. If not by her own strength then by her enemy's weakness she would win. And she knew her enemy was pitiably weak.

In less than a week she called again on little Henry, bringing with her a jar of wine jelly, a box of honey and a great armful of Jacque roses. Solicitude shone from her limpid brown eyes as she stepped into the close and odorous little room.

That day Henry's gods had forsaken him, for he was fast asleep when the visit took place, and Mrs. Sturtevant wouldn't have him wakened—not for the world. A long talk ensued between the two women. Before that visit was over Mrs. Hill was given a roll of something which she took great pains to secrete about her person, and Rags was placed in a covered market basket, the lid was tied down and it was carried out and stowed away in the carriage.

It was to be for just four days, not an hour longer. And little Henry would be so proud and was to get the prize-money and the blue ribbon at the end of the exhibition, when Rags was to be brought triumphantly back with a beautiful silver collar around his neck.

The next day the child was restless and asked for Rags. Instead of the dog his mother gave him the jar of jelly and the honey. Being inordinately hungry, Henry devoured them both and peevishly asked for Rags once more. Then his mother brought him out the roses.

The child looked at them and started up in bed.

"She's hin 'ere!" he cried suddenly, pointing a lean, challenging finger at his mother.

"'Oo?" said the woman sullenly.

"'Er, 'er, you know 'oo! Rags! I want my Rags!" now almost screamed the boy, thoroughly aroused.

His mother tried desperately to quiet him.

"Rags!" shrieked the child. "I want 'im! Rags! Let 'im come, I say. I shall 'ave 'im!"

His mother then lied to him—tried to lie to him, at least—but broke down under the weight of her own guilt and through her maudlin tears told him everything.

The boy fell gasping back on his pillow, and shook the little bed with his sobs. Mrs. Hill knew the only thing to do was to send for Dinney Crockett. Dinney would come and do stunts for him and then he might forget. It was only three days!

Four days later Mrs. Sturtevant's carriage drew up in front of Mrs. Hill's door. Mrs. Sturtevant was clasping and unclasping her hands nervously and her lips were dry.

She winced, in the doorway, under Mrs. Hill's questioning gaze.

"Oh, Mrs. Hill, it's so dreadful! I hardly know how to begin!"

"Rags?" asked the woman coldly, looking toward the carriage. "Where's Rags?"

His mother then lied to him—tried to lie to him, at least

"Yes, poor Rags," said Mrs. Sturtevant, touching a bit of lace to her eyes. There were real tears in them, for she was a clever woman. "He's—he's dead! I did everything for him, everything that could be done, but he—he died."

A short, sharp scream rang through the little house. It was the child. He had heard.

The two women seemed drawn, step by step, into the room where he lay.

They did not hesitate, yet when they stood in the room they cowered together. The boy was sitting up in his bed, his two eyes glowing like coals of fire. His commanding, lean finger was pointing straight at the heart of his mother.

"My—my dawg?" he asked shrilly, terribly. Mrs. Hill's knees were shaking and she looked hopelessly at the other woman. The other woman tried to draw herself up proudly, half-challengingly, and then looked at the pointing figure on the bed and dropped her eyes again.

She felt that this child stood above her, that he held his heel on her neck and in some way had the power of passing judgment on her. She did not think of the bit of lace.

"He's—he's dead—dear," she murmured. She meant to have said it coldly, decisively, even icily. But the words seemed to choke her.

"'E's dead!" repeated the boy, "dead!" His voice rang through the room. "'E's not! You lie. I say you lie; you lie. You know in your 'eart you lie!"

He raised his feeble body and held himself up by the bedpost. The flood of blasphemy he flung out at her had come down to him from his father. At any time and in any place that sudden volley would have been horrible in its depravity; on his white, little childish lips it was doubly, incomparably horrible.

The woman shrank back and put her hands up to her face as though to ward off a blow. With a gasp of fear she turned and fled from the room. But from the voice she could not flee. It followed her into her carriage, and up the avenue, and through the park, and into her own quiet home, where it rang louder than before, and night after night was heard echoing in all her dreams.

"If Dinney would only come!" whined the boy's mother weakly, pacing between the tub and the window and looking despairingly at the figure on the bed, that lay back clutching spasmodically at the ragged quilt, and gazed with blank, dull eyes up at the cracked ceiling. "If Dinney would only come!"

It was two nights before Dinney came. Mrs. Hill was sitting with her arms locked together, swaying her gaunt body to and fro and moaning quietly to herself. Never had she known Henry to be taken so bad. The lamp burned low, but it showed a bunch of faded Jacque roses standing on a little table beside the bed.

There came a tap at the window. A moment later an indistinct figure showed itself outside and the woman went to the window and raised the sash.

A gaunt, wistful, roguish, whimsical, laughing face was thrust through the opening. It was Dinney Crockett.

Under his coat was a sniggering, trembling, whining something that made it all he could do to climb in through the window without letting it get away.

"Ain't I bin up ag'in it, though!" half whispered and half gurgled Dinney, glancing at the bed and winking eloquently up at the woman. "T'ree hours hidin' in de coachhouse, an' seven whole hours under de main guy's bed, den stealin' de guy's keys an' gettin' blame near pinched by a cop as I slid down de fire-escape! But, say! Missus Hill, did I git 'im? Did I? Well, I guess!"

Dinney could contain himself no longer. He opened his coat, and out shot Rags.

"Won't he t'row a fit, though!" said Dinney rapturously, beaming toward the bed.

The woman turned to where the dog's nose was nuzzling down among the folds of Henry's ragged little nightgown, for the boy had covered his head with the quilt. From under the clothes came a dry sob or two, and then a deal of whimpering and barking. Just what was taking place under those same bedclothes Mrs. Hill could not altogether see. But she could guess that Rags was all but going mad with joy.

"Don't stop 'im, Dinney. Let 'im eat 'em!" said the boy's mother with a tear or two on her shrunken cheeks, as Rags, in his delight, fell to his old trick of chewing the pillow. As Mrs. Hill often afterward recounted, with a touch of awe, it was the first time in the history of Henry's dog that she hadn't the heart to cuff him for a-chewing up good bedclothes.

"I think," said the doctor that night, as he closed his medicine case with a meditative snap, "I think we've been making a mistake with this patient of ours. Dinney, you young rascal, take that"—slipping something into Dinney's hand—"and get back here with a pint of the fattest oysters you can find this side of Bowling Green."

The doctor pulled on his gloves leisurely. It was the fag end of a wearing day, but for some reason or other he felt wondrously light-hearted once more. He looked at the boy propped up in the little bed and the dog cuddling against his breast, and he went out smiling.

"Oh, I say, Mrs. Hill," he cried cheerily, putting his head in at the door again, "if that patient of yours doesn't sleep well, just give him a good big dose of Rags!"

Greely is not a talking man

The DIARY of a NEW Congressman's Wife

IF IT be true, as some one says, that "seldom is faction's ire in haughty minds extinguished but by death," then, in my humble opinion, almost every man who has risen to any prominence in either branch of our service will have to die before the factional strife here in Washington will be extinguished. It seems to me that to mention the name of any distinguished officer is enough to "let slip the dogs of war" and to set every tongue a-wagging.

I read somewhere the other day that an English writer had paid a high tribute to a certain great and wise statesman by saying that "he could hold his tongue in ten different languages," and I was immediately consumed with jealousy over the performance when I reflected that we seemed not to have a single hero who could hold his tongue even in one language. What with denials, explanations and reprimands, we have had a lively time of it at the Capital City of late. There is a tremendous army and navy contingent living here ever ready to do battle upon any provocation whatsoever, and, as the provocations are many and varied and the tongues of the two branches of the service are hung in the middle, the wagging is pretty considerable. I cannot help recalling that the five words which Zacharias spoke cost him forty weeks of silence, and to my mind another coming of Gabriel dealing out a like infliction would be a wholesome thing.

I was talking with Robert and Senator P—— about the extraordinary loquacity of our officers.

"I cannot understand," grumbled I, "why they are all possessed of so much tongue. I wonder they don't know that the tongue is just as true an indication of the state of the mind as of the state of the body. Discretion ought to be taught at the military academies, along with tactics."

"Oh, well, Agatha," said Robert, ever ready to take up the cudgels for his sex, "none of the big men of the two branches of the service have done any talking, and for the others, why it is very much the case of John Brown, of Haddington, and his students. He said to them, 'If you haven't grace, the Lord can give it to you. If you haven't learning, I'll help you to get it. But if you haven't common-sense, neither I nor the Lord can give it to you.'" Then Robert added:

"Truth is, a man scarcely dares to utter a word nowadays even in private, for there is always a newsmonger ready to rush it into print, and no letter, no matter how personal it may be, seems to be sacred to him who receives it. Why, only yesterday I met General Greely on his way to the War Department to meet the accusations brought against him concerning his speech in Worcester. Anybody who knows Greely knows that he is not a talking man. He is the most reticent, the most taciturn man going."

"That is very true," joined in the Senator. "I've known Greely well and known him for years, and he is singularly uncommunicative. It is a curious fact that never, since he returned from that terrible Polar Expedition, has he been willing to mention it in any way, nor will he permit anybody to mention it to him. In the Cosmos Club, of which he is a member, it is well understood, and the topic is never brought up. I remember, however, once that, when some of us were gathered around the pool-table, a man suddenly entered the club and, clapping the General on the back, said:

"'Well, how's my friend, General North Pole Greely?'

"There was a deadly hush for a moment all over the room, and the strange pallor which always has covered Greely's face ever since those terrible Arctic years of his seemed to deepen if possible, but he did not reply, nor appear even to hear the jocose allusion, but picked up a cue and began to knock the balls about."

Robert struck in here and said:

"By the way, Senator, you did the handsome thing by Miles in the Senate. You've given him the extra star. I hope we will do as well by him when the bill comes to us."

"Yes," replied the Senator, "we were all pretty much of one mind about Miles. He has borne himself with rare ability and discretion, and has shown on several trying occasions that he possesses what is often conspicuous in men by its absence, and what your friend Brown, of Haddington, whom you have just quoted, calls 'common-sense.' Miles has never been one to 'slop over.' The United States is the only first-class Power which does not have a full General at the head of its Army, and the days of our provincialism are past. As to the rest of the bill, there are some glaring reforms needed in our army which are provided for. One fact was developed in our war with Spain, and that was that there was very little cohesion between the line and staff, not enough working harmony between them for successful operations. The staff bureaus were almost entirely independent and with a most marked division of responsibility. The ostensible commander had practically no authority. This closer organization which the bill provides ought to do away with such misfortunes in camp and on the field as were ours in our last war."

"Still," asked Robert, "has it not always been the fate of every Commander-in-Chief of our Army in times of peace to be set aside and to be regarded as a figurehead?"

"Oh, yes. It is a grievance as old as the hills. When Sherman was General of the Army he became so incensed because Grant would send every army order from the White House to the Secretary of War that he pulled up stakes and moved his headquarters to St. Louis. But that little plan did not work, for it proved to be another case of the King of France who marched his men up a hill and then marched them down again. The War Department informed the General of the Army that the law of the land fixes the headquarters of the army at the Nation's Capital. So Sherman came back and submitted, and a smile went around the War Department."

"Please tell me," said I, "what it was that caused the Senate to smile so broadly the other day when there was an allusion during the debate on this bill to Senator Proctor and 'progressive transgression'? I saw Senator Proctor shake his head and smile. What was it?"

"Well, you see, Mrs. Slocum, Proctor has always been the champion of the army. He was the first Secretary of War under Harrison's Administration and he is an authority on military matters, and if anybody knows the inner ropes it is Proctor. A year or so ago, when the Army bill was before the Senate, the Senator from Vermont was asked to explain the manner in which staff appointments are made in the army, and he was very frank and very funny in a dry way. He said in his quiet though resonant voice:

"'The man who has the strongest pull gets the place. Suppose, for instance, there is a vacancy of a captaincy in the Quartermaster's Department. There are about 600 first lieutenants. Perhaps 300 of these will be applicants for this place, the other 300 will be just as well fitted for the place, but because they have no influential friends to back them, or because, I am glad to say, they have a nice sense of propriety, they will not seek preferment or allow others to seek it for them, resting their claims entirely, and with rare exceptions, vainly, upon their records. The applicants file briefs of their records along with letters from officers and political friends, and then the wives and sisters come to the front and take a hand and importune the President or the Secretary of War in person. But bless me! precious little consideration is given to these applications. Senator A—— or Representative B—— has a relative or a constituent with powerful influence behind him, and they demand, simply demand, the appointment—and get it! The appointee has had a promotion, not upon merit, but by influence, and has jumped many of his fellows as good or better than he.'

Champ Clark would not be the likeliest man for the Speakership

"Mr. Hawley interrupted just here to ask, slyly, if all Secretaries were alike? Proctor replied drolly:

"'Human nature is pretty much the same and transgression is progressive. Most Secretaries, when they catch on to these points fall into the same rut, but I was glad to know that the first Secretary in Harrison's Administration was a little careful for a time, but it was from a want of understanding, not from any great amount of virtue.'

"This candid statement on the part of Proctor caused a great laugh in the Senate, in which he joined. Everybody knew who Harrison's first War Secretary had been, and knew, too, what a square man he was. And so, Mrs. Slocum, that was why there was a sly allusion poked at Proctor the other day when he was pushing this Army bill, and why 'progressive transgression' was quoted."

"Well," said I, "I hope this Reorganization bill will not molest the only woman who holds a commission in the army, for I am quite interested in her."

"Oh, no! it won't touch her," said Robert quickly.

"It seemed queer," said I, "to see among the army orders the other day this one:

> "'By order of the Secretary of War, Assistant Surgeon Anita McGee, U. S. A., will proceed from this city to Fort Monroe, on official business pertaining to the Medical Department of the Army, and, on completion of this duty, will return to her proper station.'

"Page told me lately that when Doctor McGee had first been graduated as surgeon and physician she looked a mere slip of a girl, and her young friends were inclined to poke fun at her medical aspirations, until one day at a luncheon party at which were gathered some ten or twelve young women, among whom was Anita McGee, something happened to change the opinion of this light-hearted crowd. The luncheon had progressed through half the number of courses, when some sudden excitement from the street penetrated to the dining-room where the party was gathered. Instantly the young women rushed to the windows to see what had happened. It was evident that an accident had occurred, for a helpless man lay on the pavement with an impotent crowd standing about not knowing what to do. There was a cry for a doctor and for the emergency ambulance. One young girl said half-derisively:

"'Here's your chance, Anita. They're calling for a doctor.'

"There was a moment of wavering uncertainty on the part of the untried young surgeon, then quickly the pretty ornaments, the pretty hat, the dainty gloves were all laid aside and Doctor McGee stepped out to the pavement and in an authoritative manner took command of the situation. She ordered the man to be carried into the house where she assumed charge of the case and worked so deftly and so skillfully that by the time the police and the emergency ambulance had arrived the patient had been properly bandaged, a cut had been neatly sewed up and the case was turned over to the hospital with little more to be done. Page says from that day to this there has been no question of Doctor McGee's ability. All of which goes to prove that 'beard never was the true standard of brains,'" said I, triumphantly.

Robert began to laugh at this concluding remark of mine and went on:

"You would do well not to let our venerable cousin hear such heresy, Agatha, for she was much scandalized when she heard that there was actually a woman doctor on the pay-roll of the War Department who held the rank of Major, and who went every day of her life to the War Department instead of staying at home and cooking the dinner or washing the children's faces. Cousin Melinda is one who believes that man and woman were 'for contemplation he, and valor formed; for softness she, and sweet attractive grace.' In fact she is just about as progressive as the Boer women are represented to be."

The two men laughed and the Senator went on to say:

"Your mention of the Boer women is a reminder of our Boer resolution that Teller offered in the Senate. We got off better on our side of the Capitol with it than you did with a like resolution from Sulzer over in the House, Slocum."

"Yes, but you see," said Robert, "Sulzer always plays to the galleries and the applause he received for his pro-Boer resolution from that source only spurred him on until the Speaker had to squelch him. By the way, Senator, what an ugly light has been thrown upon that famous Spion Kop dispatch business over in England!"

"Yes, but Lansdowne's explanation puts him in a somewhat better light, and as for Buller, his sturdy honesty ought to do much to efface his unfortunate lack of judgment. His reply to the suggestion to smooth down that dispatch reminds me of the story of Cromwell when a famous painter undertook to reproduce him on canvas. Oliver Cromwell was probably one of the ugliest men who ever lived, and the painter had the very laudable desire to soften his face as much as possible and to that end omitted altogether a very prominent wart which adorned his cheek. As soon as Cromwell found out that his countenance was being softened, and, above all, that the wart was omitted, he touched his cheek significantly and commanded sternly:

"'Paint me as I am, sir.'

"And so Cromwell was painted just as he was, wart and all, and was handed down to posterity thus. So Buller stood as he was, lack of judgment, disaster and all. There was something fine in it," wound up the Senator.

"Well," laughed Robert, reverting to his own affairs with grim humor, "I only hope that I have succeeded in painting myself in all my pristine honesty, just as I am, to my Legislature."

"Why, I hope you have not heard anything that makes you fear the success of your candidacy for the Senate, Slocum?" quickly asked the Senator.

"Oh, no, I'm in touch with Spruce City every day and things are looking my way just now. There is a strong probability of my rival candidate withdrawing, as Chilton did in Jo Bailey's case; but there's a good bit of dissatisfaction among Republicans in my State, and there's no certainty which way the legislative cat will jump. For Mrs. Slocum's sake I hope it will jump my way, for you know, Senator——"

And Robert paused a moment and looked at me, then continued wickedly, while I resigned myself to what was coming:

"My whole reason for wishing to go to the Senate is upon Mrs. Slocum's account. You see that with Senatorial credentials in her pocket and with relations firmly established with the Diplomatic Corps through the mediumship of, and guardianship over, the young Marquise de Courcelles-to-be, there is no knowing to what dizzy heights of glory we may scale next winter, and you know that true glory takes root, spreads and shines effulgently, and this alone spurs me on to renewed effort for the Senate."

"Yes, I see," smiled the Senator.

"Well, at least," said I dryly, "there have been no bad politics to imperil my campaign here in Washington, which is more than can be said of some politicians."

"Why, I hear that the politics of the Republicans have been so 'trashy,' as my old black laundress would put it, that the House is already conceded to be sure for the Democracy in the Fifty-seventh Congress, and that the fight is already on among the Democrats for the Speakership; that it is only a question of 'out-scheming' between two men whether it will be the Honorable Champ Clark from Pike County or the Honorable James Richardson, whom you politicians call 'Slick Jim.'"

This had the desired effect. Neither man had any desire to poke any further fun at me. Robert was roused at once.

"Where did you hear any such stuff as that, Agatha?" he demanded testily; then he went on emphatically:

"The House Democratic in the Fifty-seventh Congress—pooh! And Champ Clark or Jim Richardson for Speaker—pooh, again! Why, it is as clear a case of one 'lie having to be thatched with another to keep the rain from coming through' as I ever heard of."

"Well," I said, continuing my theme placidly, "you Republicans ought to know just how much reason there is for such talk. You have had it all your own way for three years. But I tell you that I know the candidacy of these men is being canvassed genuinely in the Democratic cloak-room of the House, and they must have some serious grounds for belief that they will carry the House in November."

"Well, any way," said Senator P——, "Champ Clark would not be the likeliest man for Speaker, for it is a rule that the leader of the minority shall be in line for the chief honor of the House when his party shall succeed to power. This would place it with Richardson who is minority leader, but Richardson is under fire just now and that might leave the mantle to fall on De Armond, of Missouri, and——"

"Pshaw!" interrupted Robert, too impatient at the improbability of such things happening to hear the Senator out.

"There is just as little likelihood of our not holding the House next November as there is that Page Mason will not marry that foreign chap next week as she is scheduled to do."

"Well," said I, "I am pretty sure, as you say, that Page will marry Alain de Courcelles next week, but I am by no means so sure of the Republican House next November. I suppose, however, Robert, that you are whistling to keep up your courage, as a schoolboy does in going through a dark wood."

A Busy Man's Recreations

By Thomas B. Bryan

BUSINESS itself has not been more radically revolutionized in the past decade than has the physical side of the average business man's life. The change is as significant as it is sweeping. Better still, it is wholesome, inspiring, and in line with progress and national development.

On every hand we hear comments upon the strenuousness of modern life, particularly of that lived by the active man of affairs in America. That this condition exists, and is characteristic of the present hour, I cheerfully grant. Over against this admission, however, must be set the statement that the representative business man of to-day takes more recreation in a month than his predecessor of a generation earlier was wont to take in a year.

Who can doubt that herein is to be read the secret by which our young man of affairs is able to bear the burden of strenuousness which is peculiar to this day and hour, and to thrive under its intense exactions? Because he lengthens his hours of relaxation, he is able to shorten his day at the desk, the counter or the factory. Recreation is the oil by which the wheels of business life are lubricated. Without it the wear and tear quickly become abnormal and the human machine prematurely worn out; but when all absorbing cares and intense application to business are reduced to a minimum, the mind is given variety, and turns from business to recreation and from recreation to business with equal pleasure and zest.

This is as it should be; there should be as spontaneous a pleasure in beginning a day's work as in putting that work aside for a few hours of indulgence in a favorite sport. The successful man, the world over, is the one who loves his work, to whom it is a joy instead of a task. Such an attitude of mind cannot be forced, but it may be cultivated, and nothing would seem better calculated to foster it than the regular indulgence in some form of vigorous, absorbing and wholesome athletic sport.

In the choice of a medium of mental relaxation and physical development, the field of selection is growing constantly wider, and the man who cannot find something of this kind which appeals to his personal tastes must be strangely fastidious. As this is so largely a matter of individual preference, it is most difficult to formulate any general rules of guidance which are of value. There is, however, one rule applicable to every individual. Indoor sports, while valuable and perhaps indispensable, are wholly insufficient, and fall short of that great essential—life in the open air. This, however, is not enough to ask of his sports; they should give him good, stirring exercise while he is out of doors.

The Two Most Popular Sports

The two forms of recreation which have taken the greatest hold upon the American public are bicycle riding and golf. Why these pastimes have attained so great a popularity in this country is not difficult to understand, and an analysis of the elements of their great success involves an enumeration of those elements which must be found in every sport which approaches the ideal.

Wheeling and golfing are equally adapted to the pleasure of both men and women, and naturally bring them together for their outings. This insures the wheel and the golf club a place in thousands of homes from which they would otherwise be excluded, for many husbands will not allow themselves regular indulgence in a recreation which may not be shared by their wives, and when to the intrinsic interest of any recreation is added the zest of social intercourse between the two sexes, its pleasures and attractions are multiplied.

That pastime which calls its participants into places of scenic beauty, and at the same time furnishes them with the exhilaration of interesting exercise, possesses a sure and a potent charm. No recreation possesses this characteristic in a greater degree than does golf. In order that my words may not appear to be those of a devotee, I will say that I am wholly unskilled in this pastime, and view its charms from the standpoint of a disinterested spectator. However, I must confess that it appears almost ideal as a means of recreation for the young business man who is in fairly comfortable circumstances financially.

The hold which the ancient Scottish sport has secured upon the American public is little short of astounding. A conservative authority places the money spent in golfing last year by the people of this country at fifteen million dollars, and estimates that the grounds, buildings and improvements of those golf clubs owning their links and houses reach a value of $150,000,000. If any further testimony to the popularity of this recreation is needed, it may be said that the membership of the golf clubs of this country is fully 100,000, and that new associations are being organized with greater rapidity than that of industrial "trusts" and consolidations.

The Ideal Sport for Business Men

So much for the hold which this sport has upon the nation at large. The power which it exercises upon the individual is peculiar, and well worthy of analysis. Thousands of business men, young and old, cut short their work day for the sake of a few hours on the links. Instead of eating a hearty luncheon and then returning to his office, the golfer remains until he feels at liberty to quit for the day. When he draws down the curtain of his desk, it is with the happy consciousness that the click of the lock has shut within the cares and anxieties of business until another morning. He then hurries directly to the train, where he meets congenial associates who are full of enthusiasm for their sport. So diverting is this topic that the thirty or forty minutes required to reach the suburban station nearest the golf grounds are passed almost before our golfer is aware. Then follows a ride in the coach or 'bus to the club house.

From the moment of arrival at the station until the instant of return thereto the eye is rejoiced and rested by surroundings as distinctly rural as could be found a hundred miles away from the city. At the club house our golfer goes at once to the locker-room where he takes a hasty "scrub" and discards his business suit for the habiliments of the links. In place of the stiff collar and shirt of conventional wear, he has substitutes of the most grateful kind, which admit the utmost relaxation. Most restful is the change of shoes, for the low, heavy-soled affairs devised for walking over the grassy, uneven and yielding surface of the links are remarkably easy to the feet.

Thus appareled he goes to the café, and there takes a cup of coffee and a roll, deferring his hearty meal until after his physical exertions have sharpened his appetite and prepared his system for a repast of generous proportions. He will not neglect to drink plenty of water before going out for his long tramp over the sward. When he returns to the club house, after playing an eighteen-hole course, he has walked little less than four miles, and over soft-rolling greensward, instead of a hard, level, city pavement. This in itself is a most refreshing change and brings into play muscles not exercised in the routine of city walking.

Where Youth is Renewed and Strengthened

Add to this the splendid exertions of the golfer in driving his ball, his intense interest in the results of his strokes, and there is little room to marvel at the glow of health and enthusiasm which flushes the countenances of staid and white-headed business men, to whom the coming of golf has brought a positive renewal of youth. But the mere physical exercise of a round on the links is by no means the chief benefit of the pastime.

While our golfer is chasing his ball up hill and down dale over the grass, he is unconsciously drinking in the "sweet influences" of the landscape. Few men, indeed, are of so cold and material a fibre as not to be subject in some degree to this subtle power of field and wood, of stream and sky. The assimilation of the charm of Nature may be unconscious, but it is nevertheless certain. Every breath he draws and each glance over the green and inviting prospect ministers to the best that is in him, and he finds himself more vitally refreshed in soul, sentiment and mind than in body. In most instances the pleasure of this pilgrimage is augmented by the delights of companionable intercourse with friends who share his enthusiasm for the sport in hand.

Once more he repairs to the locker-room, where he takes a shower bath, and possibly a plunge in the swimming pool. Then he is rubbed down and, after a complete change of underclothing, is ready for dinner—and such a dinner as only a golfer can eat after making the circuit of the links! It is eaten with genuine gusto amid surroundings of the pleasantest kind. If the day be Saturday it is likely to conclude with dancing in the evening.

Who can look at the history of such a day as this and doubt that its rejuvenating and inspiring influence will follow him throughout the week to come? Equally certain is it that in this sketch of a young business man's day at the links its charms have not been exaggerated.

The Benefits of Bicycling

Although much is now being said concerning the decline of wheeling, this form of exercise has already exerted a marvelous influence upon the physical and also the mental side of a young business man's life, and it has as surely come to stay. In the report of that manufacturing organization frequently referred to as the bicycle trust the statement is made that the output of wheels for the present year is based upon the conviction that more bicycles will be sold in the coming season than in any preceding year. This announcement is significant, inasmuch as it is the basis upon which this combination of bicycle manufacturers has regulated its supply.

It is undoubtedly true that the day of the bicycle club as separate and distinct from the social club has passed. Wheeling has taken a more individual and less organized form. There is less club riding, it appears, but more individual riding. Thousands of business men in the smaller cities and country towns, who have long withstood the temptations of bicycling, are now joining the ranks of the wheelmen. There can be little question that the bicycle has been one of the main factors in revolutionizing the physical life of the American business man, broadening his horizon and giving him keen enjoyment, vigorous exercise, variety of scene and many other pleasures where before he had only additional hours of drudgery.

As an apt illustration there may be cited the instance of a country parson, of only local renown, recently elevated to the Episcopate.

His almost unanimous election as Coadjutor Bishop in the Episcopal church is ascribable to the rare combination in a clergyman of mental and physical muscle of the most robust character.

His ability to aid effectively the venerable Bishop, whom in time he is likely to succeed, is largely due to systematic and vigorous outdoor exercise with its reflex, invigorating influence on the naturally strong brain with which he is gifted. In a single day he has sped, with delight to the body and refreshment to the mind, some ninety miles on his wheel before discharging the evening duties of his high calling.

The Italians say that "in every priestling there is a pope," a playful exaggeration of an exceedingly rare occurrence, but here we have a priest in a country parish of such signal ability, mental and physical, running quickly, suddenly, unexpectedly and as smoothly as a wheel over an asphalt pavement, from his little rural church into the most exalted office of his sacred calling.

Six Days of Systematic Exercise

It is very difficult to prescribe any arbitrary program of exercise applicable to the majority of young business men. The nearest approach to success in an attempt of this kind is the following program, which is designed for a business man who has not a private gymnasium, but is a member of a club having athletic privileges:

Monday: Exercise ten minutes with half-pound dumb-bells before going to business. In afternoon a swim in the tank at the athletic club, and, if possible, an impromptu game of water polo.

Tuesday: Before going downtown, ten minutes of lively work with an elastic or pulley exerciser; very light lunch; leave business early for the country club, and play eighteen holes of golf; shower bath and plunge, followed by brisk rubbing and an entire change of clothing; hearty dinner and a social evening.

Wednesday: Ten minutes with two-pound dumb-bells; business; hearty lunch; four three-minute rounds with the boxing instructor at the athletic club, following the close of business; billiards in the evening, playing not more than 150 points balk line, or 200 points straight rail, to strengthen the muscles of legs and back.

Thursday: Indian clubs in the morning for ten minutes; stand out of doors and practice diaphragm breathing of the cool air for five minutes; business lunch; close the day with a twenty-mile spin on the wheel.

Friday: A pull of ten minutes at the elastic exerciser, followed by bag punching for five minutes before hearty breakfast; light lunch at noon followed by a game of billiards; in the evening a swim in the pool at club or game of horse tennis in the gymnasium.

Saturday: Morning exercise over back of chair to strengthen muscles of the back and abdomen and legs; light breakfast followed by half day at the office; leave business at midday and take cup of coffee and roll at the golf club; play until dark, and take a shower bath and a brisk rub on returning to the locker-room; eat hearty dinner, and conclude the day with dancing in the evening.

The Advantages of Athletics in Business

No doubt very many young men of affairs may find it inconvenient, if not impossible, to carry out so thorough a program of physical exercise. To such be it said: Get as much good, wholesome out-of-door exercise as possible, and absolutely refuse to be content with less than an average of two hours of stirring recreation every day. This should be regarded as the minimum limit.

Those forms of diversion which have already been referred to are the principal ones, but there are many others which may be easily substituted to meet individual tastes. Horseback riding may be preferred to wheeling, and walking to either. The forms of indoor exercise are numerous, and capable of meeting a wide variety of tastes. One of the most fascinating and beneficial of the gymnasium sports is handball, and it seems unfortunate that this should recently have fallen into disuse, as compared with its former popularity.

The need of healthy and normal men in business and public life is becoming daily more clearly recognized. The day of the super-refined, æsthetic recluse is past. Men who would lead in their profession or business must not be physical weaklings. The great modern enterprise is almost invariably found to be in the hands of the man who is physically, as well as mentally, able to bear the brunt of things, to endure protracted exertion and strain, and to face a crisis with the assurance that he will not "go to pieces" because of bodily weakness. In hundreds of different situations this requirement is absolute, and those lacking this qualification are arbitrarily shut out, no matter how brilliant their mental endowments.

Broadly speaking, therefore, it may be said that no young man of to-day is fitted for business life who is not in excellent physical trim, and who neglects to keep himself in this condition by means of faithful and judicious exercise. He increases his chances of success as he increases his bodily strength, soundness and capacity. The less artificial the means of exercise the more easily is it sustained and the greater the benefit derived. For this reason games and sports are much more to be recommended than physical drills devoid of the element of contest and prosecuted by sheer force of will. It is also wise to vary one's diversions before they become stale and outworn. This insures a fresh influx of enthusiasm, and keeps the recreation free from irksomeness and artificiality.

That the world should have reached a period in which the hours of toil are so generally shortened and the hours of recreation prolonged is certainly a gratifying proof of progress, for it demonstrates, in a measure, that man's existence need not be an unbroken round of toil, and that he may become more useful, more happy, more successful by taking time for a reasonable amount of stirring physical exercise, than by denying himself this wholesome joy to become the abject slave of care and ambition.

The Literature of the Automobile

MR. JOSEPH PENNELL has been bitten by the automobile craze, as he was by the bicycle craze in its early days. The other day he drove a road-car from Maidenhead to Warwick Square in London, a distance of twenty-nine miles, a good part of it through the crowded streets of the city, in an hour, and is proud of his record. The automobile seems a less inspiring subject than the bicycle to draw or to write about. But when one remembers how delightfully Mr. and Mrs. Pennell have described their cycling trips one hopes that the new mode of locomotion will furnish many subjects for articles.

WHAT to READ
The Books of the Week

Mr. Jacobs' Nautical Farce *

If a man may be judged by the children of his brain, Mr. W. W. Jacobs, author of A Master of Craft, is a most immoral man—a man with no appreciation whatever of the beauties of truthfulness and exemplary conduct; for, of the sixteen or eighteen characters engaged in deceiving one another throughout this story, not a sinner among them shows the slightest contrition for his misdeeds or regret for his condition.

Mr. Jacobs has gained a reputation as a writer of sea tales, and he may be familiar with the field; but neither in this book nor in any of its predecessors is there internal evidence that he knows the poop-deck downhaul from a splice in the main brace. Admiring landsmen, engulfed in non-nautical ignorance, have given him this reputation, and he wears it lightly and jauntily. With a few stock properties, such as ship, schooner, a skipper, a mate, a cabin-companion and a forecastle-scuttle, he concocts a story, calls his characters sailor-folk, and gives the tale a nautical title. And in this he does wrong—not to his readers, but to the small number of limited writers whose thunder he appropriates without needing it.

But, admitting all this, we cannot deny him a place higher than that of the most realistic and erudite of sea-writers; he is a humorist; he is intensely human and he knows human beings; he can make us laugh—and a man who can do that, who can take us for one short half-hour away from the troubles of life and give us the relaxation of a hearty laugh, is a valuable man to his kind and to his generation.

The story is of a schooner Captain, strong in physique but weak in character, who, with a penchant for pretty girls, allows himself to become engaged to three, only one of whom he wants. In his efforts to escape the other two, he is hampered by the movements of his wealthy uncle, who has chosen one of the girls for him, and who is finally rendered innocuous from his own capture by a designing widow. He is worried and harried around the country by the relatives of the other unwanted young lady, and, escaping them, ships before the mast on a deep-water voyage, thinking that the loved one is on board as passenger. He is assisted throughout by his mate, who unconsciously and helplessly falls in love with this loved one while earnestly working for his friend's interests; and he is helped, harmed, checkmated and misled by the well-meant interference of his crew—three men and a cook. Be it said that the mate is a good fellow—though a liar—and that Poppy Tyrrell, equally untruthful, is a charming girl, who eventually marries the mate, thinking the Captain drowned at sea; and that the Captain, after shipwreck and trouble, returns just in time to meet the wedding party emerging from the church, with dignity and philosophy enough in his composition to induce him to heave a handful of rice over them, and we have the salient points of a story in which vice is rewarded and misfortune punished.

Debts of Honor †

Maurus Jókai is, we are given to understand, the most popular of Hungarian novelists, and the fact that all his books are speedily translated into English proves that he has many readers outside his native land. People enamored of incident and indifferent to art may well take pleasure in these rudely-constructed tales. Robbery, murder, plots and counter-plots, crimes of every order and variety are huddled together in uneasy abundance. Now and then we have a pleasant picture of family life, as in the house of the Pressburg baker, where the schoolboys help to knead the dough and cut the smooth, round rolls before hurrying off to their lessons; but this is too speedily followed by a mass of confusing detail, which we dimly feel is intended to be humorous, or by scenes of lurid and eminently disagreeable violence.

Debts of Honor is written partly in the first and partly in the second person. It deals with the fortunes of a Magyar family over whom hangs an ancestral curse impelling all its men to commit suicide. In the first chapter the head of the house, for no apparent reason save to keep up ancient traditions, blows out his brains; and his mother takes this admirable opportunity to conduct her two young grandsons into the vault where their father lies buried to narrate to them the suicidal history of their race, and to impress upon their tender minds the impossibility of escape. A finer method of securing the perpetuity of the curse could not well be devised and so the excellent old lady seems to understand, for she winds up her story by remarking that she does not ask the boys to swear they will never kill themselves lest they carry with them into eternity the added burden of an unkept oath.

She then "wept and gasped until finally she fainted away," and Lorand and Desiderius are left to face the unpleasant future before them.

They do face it, but in different fashions. Lorand, the most amorous of youths, falls in love first with his uncle's wife, then with his cousin, and lastly with a handsome, half-tamed gypsy girl. When his uncle's wife runs away with an actor, his cousin marries a rogue and the gypsy girl is killed by a robber, he grows melancholy, acquires a bad habit of reading mathematical books, and is saved from suicide only by the superhuman wisdom and goodness of Desiderius, who constitutes himself his brother's keeper, rescues him in every emergency and watches over him with tenacious affection. After a time this influence weakens, but Lorand dies opportunely of a bee's sting in "the moment of temptation," and the novel closes with a speculation on the part of Desiderius as to how long his own life will last.

It is a cheerful tale. —Agnes Repplier.

Glimpses of New Books

Any one who watches at all closely the stage and the bookstall must notice the tremendous reaction which has set in against the novel of decomposition—or, if the word is offensive, of analysis; the historical novel and the tale of adventure are in great vogue now. Mr. Andrew Balfour, whose name should give him right to treat of things Scotch, swells the tide with a dashing story of a shipwrecked American girl, a runaway Scotchman, a French dancing master, much fighting and some misunderstanding, and the usual percentage of patient solicitor necessary to precipitate a happy ending from the troubled elements of the solution. The ending, by the way, is less vindictive than the title Vengeance is Mine would indicate was the author's intention. The New Amsterdam Book Company.

In opposition to the Divine Comedy, Mrs Lee—whom the magazine public has long known as Jeannett Barbour Perry—entitles her first book Kate Wetherill: An Earth Comedy. The opposition, however, is purely titulary, whereas the resemblance is structural. Like the Divine Comedy, the story, which deals with internal forces and moral happenings, falls naturally into the three divisions of Hell, Purgatory and Paradise. The volume is prefaced by Dante's apology for the Comedy, and closes significantly with a phrase which shows that the interpretation of the earlier master was in mind throughout: "The comedy was ended." The Century Company.

Hearts Importunate is published in a single volume, and so cannot by any stretch of imagination soever be likened to the English novel of the eighteenth century, which, in its leisurely career across the centuries, Mr. Kipling, sighting from the horizon of the twentieth century, has named the "three-decker." It has not even any "scent of Old World roses about it," for the climate of the Australian bush is too hot for anything of the sort. Yet there is something suggestive of the method of Richardson in Miss Dickinson's workmanship. The action is similarly lazy; in fact, very little happens in the whole book. The few bodily facts of the daily, outside work in which the characters move are direct resultants of the heated and active forces of the inner world in which they live. And such a method—essentially dramatic in feeling if not in form—is suggestive of Richardson. Dodd, Mead & Co.

With Mr. Clive Holland's system of work his literary career need not cease until, like Alexander, he sighs for more worlds. This does not mean that Mr. Holland intends to be an epic poet, a historian of ancient Chaldea or a professional humorist; rather that with his weapon of fiction he means to traverse the globe and write stories full of the local color of as many countries as he can manage to visit. "I began with Japan, I have done something with Northern Italy and with Egypt, and I am now fresh from Paris and the Latin Quarter."

Mr. Holland thinks four countries a small record, but he likes to feel that he has written all he can about a country before he leaves it. It might also be said that he likes to take all the photographs of it he can before he departs. It would be a difficult artistic question to decide, Mr. Holland thinks, whether a love of local color makes one a photographer, or whether love of photography sends one traveling in search of local color. At any rate, the result is that it takes one a long time to see a country, even a city.

"I have been wandering everywhere in Paris, seeing fashionable 'meets' of automobiles in the Bois and half anarchistic meetings of workingmen in La Villette, exploring historic quarters, and tracking Du Maurier through what I call 'Trilby land.' Marcelle of the Latin Quarter is the first result of this Parisian visit. There will be more stories later."

"Isn't it a difficult thing to write of life in the Latin Quarter without offending some readers' sensibilities?" Mr. Holland was asked.

"Yes, it is," he replied, "and I for one have no wish to. That's one reason why this story was not published serially. I mean always to write delicately, but—you never can tell. So I think my title has helped me. Any one who buys a book called Marcelle of the Latin Quarter knows what risk he is running. If he is disappointed, it is, in this case, probably because he expected something bad."

The Home of the Treasure-Seekers

When story-tellers do not put the people around them into their books, they are apt at least to put in the streets, or the fields and meadows in which they live. The reader of that delightful book of stories about children, The Treasure-Seekers, if he knew his London well, might almost have found out from the book where its clever author, E. Nesbit, or as she is in private life, Mrs. Hubert Bland, was to be found. The children in the book had picnics in Greenwich Park, and Blackheath was familiar ground to them. It was near there that they found the Princess.

The little village of Eltham lies near Blackheath and Greenwich and at the foot of Shooter's Hill, on which you can see the roofs of Mr. Nat Goodwin's delightful house nestling in the trees. It is only a little over a half hour's journey from the very heart of London, yet is a country village still. Well Hall is the Bland place. It is a delightfully old house, or it would be for America. And when it was found that the winding staircase must be propped up by poles as big as a yacht's masts, even the English family living in it had to grant it antiquity. Yet all around are traces of the older house which preceded it. Well Hall was originally a moated grange, and the moat still surrounds the house on three sides. The children catch fish in it in the summer, and skate on it in the winter—when the English winter grows cold enough for the ice to form, which is not often. The combination of Old World country surroundings with quick and frequent trains to town is a rare one, even for England.

Henry Harland's New Novel

Mr. Henry Harland is shortly to bring out a new volume entitled The Cardinal's Snuff-Box, the scene of which is laid, like so many of the author's short stories, in the Italy he paints so well. This is the first long story Mr. Harland has written since the earlier days of his career when he signed himself "Sidney Luska." For the last few years he has been known by his collections of short stories.

Mr. Harland writes very slowly, as the finished quality of his work indicates, and he is greatly affected by his surroundings. It is no uncommon thing for him to arrive in a place where he has intended to stay and work for some weeks, and to find that it is quite uncongenial to him and that he must move on somewhere else. Paris always inspires him; so does Dieppe, and the greater part of The Cardinal's Snuff-Box was written in a delightful and primitive old inn in Normandy, perched up some five hundred feet above the Seine and surrounded by fairy forests.

Even the pen of Mr. Harland, capricious as it is, could hardly help moving swiftly in a spot like that. Yet he seems to find his own workroom in town just as inspiring, though it is bare of all furniture except a chair and a writing-table, and has a real London view of the housetops. It does not suggest the elfin charm of his stories, but—cherchez la femme! The walls of this den are covered with prints of all the beautiful ladies in the picture galleries of Europe; and perhaps they, endowed by the author with life and wit and soul, are the charming creatures who step in and out of his pages.

At all events they have the power to keep him working all through the daylight, for Mr. Harland is not one of those who write far into the night. He goes into his study after an early breakfast, takes very little food all day, and emerges at dinner-time ready for any friendly intercourse that may come his way. He is a marvelously lively and enthusiastic talker, and has a kind of vivacity of manner which is scarcely English or American. He likes to be on his feet, to pace the rooms while his thoughts flow and to gesticulate when they excite him. He laughingly says of himself that talking is the best exercise he knows, and that he keeps his health by it.

Busy Miss Sharp

Even for London and the year 1900, a place and a time when all women have interests various enough to have driven their grandmothers mad, Miss Evelyn Sharp is an unusually busy young woman. The public knows her as the author of occasional delightful volumes of fairy tales, and of short stories in the magazines for older people. The initiate in London also know that she is responsible for the humorous sketches of social and literary London which are printed week by week in the Pall Mall Gazette over the initials E. S. And she has lately undertaken to do a similar weekly contribution to a new morning daily.

This amount of regular literary work would be quite enough to make many a writer think himself busy, but it is only the beginning of Miss Sharp's activities. Every morning between breakfast and luncheon she teaches a family of children whose good fortune it is to have their primary instruction committed to her charge. Then there are two afternoons a week when Miss Sharp plays hockey with a women's team in Battersea Park, and two evenings when she works hard in a class in gymnastics. She has found time to give a course of lectures on the history and names of the London streets to a club of working girls in a social settlement. To these duties Miss Sharp adds cheerfully the one which the old-fashioned view of woman's sphere thought quite sufficient for her activities, for she keeps house in a snug flat in Kensington, with a most uncommon outlook, over the gardens of the Carmelite Monastery.

As to pleasures, Miss Sharp finds time for many a tea, dinner or supper with the best-known people in the London artistic world, and time to see almost everything at the theatres. The stage is a great delight to her, and not only does she know the West End playhouses, but she visits the cheaper theatres of the East End. It is said that some holiday time she means to amuse herself by trying to write a lurid melodrama which would please a Whitechapel audience.

"I like writing fairy stories best of all," replied Miss Sharp to a question, "but sometimes I think that nowadays only 'grown-ups' like reading them. Modern children are a hard-headed, practical lot. They are always so afraid that fairy tales are being 'written down' to their level. And children resent nothing so much as that."

Oddities and Novelties of Every-Day Science

AT WELLESLEY, Massachusetts, a suburb of Boston and the seat of Wellesley College, are to be found the only successful Italian gardens in this country.

As most people are aware, the distinctive feature of such gardens is the picturesque distortion of trees and shrubs, which are made to assume as many strange and outlandish forms as possible, imitative of anything unplantlike, from a buffalo to a pepper-caster. Very weird effects are produced in this way by the expert, and, at Wellesley, a considerable area bordering upon Lake Waban, a beautiful sheet of water, has been thus transformed into a playground of horticultural fancy.

The gardens are directly across the lake from the college, and, with their groves of arboricultural freaks, stretch down to the very edge of the water in a series of grassy terraces. They belong to the country place of Mr. Hollis Hunnewell.

The trees manipulated in this curious way are chiefly pines, spruces, firs and hemlocks.

BY THE LAKESIDE, WELLESLEY, MASS.

It is wonderful what may be done with a pine tree, for instance, by taking it when it is very young and keeping its branches cut down, the result being that, instead of spreading outwardly in the normal fashion, its limbs put out a multitude of tiny branches, so as to form at length a veritable mass of interlaced twigs.

When this has been accomplished, the gardener's shears will convert the tree into any shape that may be desired; it is simply a matter of sculpture and persistent trimming to maintain the form.

The Rarest of Living Birds So rare and remarkable a fowl is the Notornis, of New Zealand, that the recent capture of a specimen—the fourth ever taken so far as science has record—is quite an ornithological event. The first two, killed in 1849 and 1851, are preserved, stuffed, in the British Museum, and the third, which was sold for $500, is in Dresden. For the fourth, just mentioned, $1500 is said to have been refused.

The Notornis is more popularly known as the Weka. It is a species of rail, but looks somewhat like a goose, and has a curious triangular bill with a small red comb above it that stands crosswise. It cannot fly at all, its feathers being too soft and yielding, but it is a first-rate runner, and one of its odd traits is a weakness for thieving, its special passion being to steal everything it can lay beak upon, even to such articles as pipes and watches.

New Zealand has many queer birds. One of them, the Apteryx, lives in a burrow, being flightless like the Notornis, and, owing to this misfortune, it has been hunted almost to extermination. The Apteryx is related to the gigantic Moa, which became extinct in New Zealand not much more than a century ago. The Moa weighed as much as 1000 pounds when full grown. Still surviving is a species of plover which is the only known bird whose bill is bent sidewise, the peculiarity being not a malformation, but designed by Nature to enable the fowl to turn over pebbles in seeking its food.

In New Zealand also is found the strange flesh-eating parrot, which became such a nuisance to the sheep farmers in that country some years ago that active measures had to be taken for its destruction. It attacks sheep in the pasture, clinging to the wool of the animal and pecking at its flesh until it literally bores a hole through its back, thus getting at the kidneys, the location of which it seems to know perfectly.

Portraits of the Sun Photographic observations of the recent total eclipse of the sun will certainly prove far more satisfactory and valuable than any hitherto obtained. On no previous occasion has the scientific outfit for picture-making been anything like so complete, and publication of prints from the negatives secured by the Smithsonian Institution with the aid of its gigantic camera, set up at Wadesboro, North Carolina, in the track of the moon's shadow, is awaited with eagerness by astronomers. This camera—the largest ever constructed—was provided with a telescopic lens having a focal length of 135 feet, the dry plate, twenty inches square, being that distance away from the lens!

If it had been desired merely to take a picture of the sun on an ordinary day, an exposure of about four one-thousandths of a second would have sufficed. As it was, the face of the luminary being covered by the moon, exposures of four to five seconds were made to photograph the red flames which are seen leaping from the photosphere at the moment of totality. To catch the fainter, but even more interesting, "corona," which extends its filmy and mysterious network millions of miles into outer space, exposures of ten to fifteen seconds were required.

Inasmuch as totality lasted only a minute and a half, it was important that the smallest possibility of mistake in the management of the instrument should be eliminated, and repeated drills with the camera were practiced preliminarily, under the supervision of Mr. Smillie, of the National Museum, who, at the conclusion of the performance, carried the exposed plates back to Washington for development. How carefully they were handled may well be imagined.

FIRST CHAPTER—HIS YOUTH

HAROLD was about ten years of age when his father, the Rev. Mr. Excell, took the pastorate of the First Church in Rock River. Many of the people in his first congregation remarked upon "the handsome lad." The clear brown of his face, his big yellow-brown eyes, his slender hands and the grace of his movements gave him distinction quite aside from that arising from his connection with the minister.

Rev. John Excell was a personable man himself. He was tall and broad-shouldered, with abundant brown hair and beard and a winning smile. His eyes were dark and introspective, but they could glow like sunlit topaz, or grow dim with tears, as his congregation had opportunity to observe during this first sermon—but they were essentially sad eyes.

Mrs. Excell, a colorless little woman who retained only the dim outline of her girlhood's beauty, sat gracelessly in her pew, but her stepdaughter, Maud, by her side, was carrying to early maturity a dainty grace united with something strong and fine drawn from her father. She had his proud lift of the head.

"What a fine family!" whispered the women from pew to pew under cover of the creaking fans.

In the midst of the first sermon, a boy seated in front of Harold gave a shrill whoop of agony and glared back at the minister's son with distorted face, and only the prompt action on the part of both mothers prevented a clamorous encounter over the pew. Harold had stuck the head of a pin in the toe of his boot and jabbed his neighbor in the calf of the leg. It was an old trick, but it served well.

The minister did not interrupt his reading, but a deep flush of hot blood arose to his face, and the lids of his eyes dropped to shut out the searching gaze of his parishioners. From that moment Harold was known as "that preacher's boy," the intention being to convey, by significant inflections and a meaning smile, that he filled the usual description of a minister's graceless son.

Harold soon became renowned in his own world. He had no hard-fought battles, though he had scores of quarrels, for he scared his opponents by the suddenness and the intensity of his rage.

"You touch me and I'll kill you," he said in a low voice to the fat boy whose leg he had jabbed, and his bloodless face and blazing eyes caused the boy to leap frenziedly away. No one, not even youths grown to man's stature, cared to attempt violence with him. One lad, struck with a stone from his cunning right hand, was carried home in a carriage. Another, being thrown by one convulsive effort, fell upon his arm, breaking it at the elbow. In less than a week every boy in Rock River knew something of Harry Excell's furious temper and had learned that it was safer to be friend than enemy to him.

He had his partisans, too, for his was a singularly attractive nature when not enraged. He was a hearty, buoyant playmate and a good scholar five days out of six, but he demanded a certain consideration at all times. An accidental harm he bore easily, but an intentional injury—that was flame to powder.

The teachers in the public school each had him in turn as he ran rapidly up the grades. They all admired him unreservedly, but most of them were afraid of him, so that he received no more decisive check than at home. He was subject to no will but his own.

The principal was a kind and scholarly old man, who could make a boy cry with remorse and shame by his Christ-like gentleness, and Harold also wept in his presence, but that did not prevent him from fairly knocking out the brains of the next boy who annoyed him. In his furious, fickle way he often defended his chums or smaller boys, so that it was not easy to condemn him entirely.

There were rumors from the first Monday after Harold's pin-sticking exploit, that the minister had "lively sessions" with his boy. The old sexton privately declared that he heard muffled cries and the sound of blows rising from the cellar of the parsonage—but this story was quickly hushed on his lips.

The boy admittedly needed thrashing, but the deacons of the church would rather not have it known that the minister used the rod himself.

The rumors of the preacher's stern measures softened the judgment of some of the townspeople, who shifted some of the blame of the son to the shoulders of the sire. Harry called his father "the minister," and seemed to have no regard for him beyond a certain respect for his physical strength. When boys came by and raised the swimming sign he replied, "Wait till I ask 'the minister.'" This was considered "queer" in him.

He ignored his stepmother completely, but tormented his sister Maud in a thousand impish ways. He disarranged her neatly combed hair. He threw mud on her dress and put carriage grease on her white stockings on picnic day. He called her "chiny-thing," in allusion to her pretty round cheeks and clear complexion, and yet he loved her and would instantly fight for her, and no one else dared tease her or utter a word to annoy her. She was fourteen years of age when Mr. Excell came to town, and at sixteen considered herself a young lady. As suitors began to gather about her, they each had a vigorous trial to undergo with Harold; it was indeed equivalent to running the gauntlet. Maud was always in terror of him on the evenings when she had callers.

"Gosling," she said in her sweet, soft breathing voice

One day he threw a handful of small garter snakes into the parlor where his sister sat with young Mr. Norton. Maud sprang to a chair screaming wildly, while her suitor caught the snakes and threw them from the window just as the minister's tall form appeared.

"What is the matter?" he asked.

Maud, eager to shield Harry, said: "Oh, nothing much, papa—only one of Harry's jokes."

"Tell me," said the minister to the young man, who, with a painful smile on his face, stammeringly replied:

"Harry thought he'd scare me, that's all. It didn't amount to much."

"I insist on knowing the truth, Mr. Norton," the minister sternly insisted.

As Norton described the boy's action, Mr. Excell's face paled and his lips set close. His eyes became terrible to meet and the beaded sweat of his furious anger stood thick on his face. "Thank you," he said with ominous calmness and, turning without another word, went to his study.

Rev. John Excell was a personable man himself

His wife, stealing up, found the door locked and her husband walking the floor like a roused tiger. White and shaking with a sort of awe, Mrs. Excell ran down to the kitchen where Harold crouched and said:

"Harold, dear, you'd better go out to Mr. Burns' right away."

Harold understood perfectly what she meant, and fled. For hours neither Mrs. Excell nor Maud spoke above a whisper. When the minister came down to tea he made no comment on Harry's absence. He had worn out his white-hot rage, but was not yet in full control of himself.

He remained silent and kept his eyes on his plate during the meal.

The last time he had punished Harold the scene narrowly escaped a tragic ending. When the struggle ended Harold lay on the floor insensible.

When he had become calm and Harold was sleeping naturally in his own bed, the father knelt at his wife's knee and prayed God for grace to bear his burden, and said:

"Mary, keep us apart when we are angry. He is like me: he has my fiendish temper. No matter what I say or do, keep us apart till I am calm. By God's grace I will never touch his flesh again in anger."

Nevertheless he dared not trust himself to refer to the battles which shamed them all. The boy was deeply repentant, but uttered no word of it. And so they grew ever more silent in their intercourse.

Harold early developed remarkable skill with horses and once rode in the races at the County Fair, to the scandal of the First Church. He not only won the race, but was at once offered a great deal of money to go with the victor to other races. To his plea the father, with deep-laid diplomacy, replied:

"Very well; study hard this year and next year you may go." But the boy was just at the age to take on weight rapidly, and by the end of the year was too heavy, and the owner of the horse refused to repeat his offer. Harold did not fail to remark how he had been cheated, but said nothing more of his wish to be a jockey.

He was also fond of firearms, and during his boyhood his father tried in every way to keep weapons from him, and a box in his study contained a contraband collection of his son's weapons. There was a certain pathos in this little arsenal, for it gave evidence of considerable labor on the boy's part and expressed much of buoyant hope and restless energy.

There were a half-dozen Fourth of July pistols, as many cannons for crackers, and three attempts at real guns intended to explode powder and throw a bullet. Some of them were "toggled up" with twine, and one or two had handles rudely carved out of wood. Two of them were genuine revolvers which he had managed to earn by working in the harvest field on the Burns' farm.

From his fifteenth year he was never without a shotgun and revolver. The shotgun was allowed, but the revolver was still contraband and kept carefully concealed. On Fourth of July he always helped to fire the anvil and fireworks, for he was deft and sure and quite at home with explosives. He had acquired great skill with both gun and pistol as early as his thirteenth year, and his feats of marksmanship came now and then to the ears of his father.

The father and son were in open warfare. Harold submitted to every command, outwardly, but inwardly vowed to break all restraint which he considered useless or unjust.

His greatest ambition was to acquire a "mustang pony," for all the adventurous spirits of the novels he had known carried revolvers and rode mustangs. He did not read much, but when he did it was always some tale of fighting. He was too restless and active to continue at a book of his own accord for any length of time, but he listened delightedly to any one who consented to read for him. When his sister Maud wished to do him a great favor and to enjoy his company (for she loved him dearly) she read some exciting story of the plains while he lay out on his stomach in the grass under the trees, with restless feet swinging like pendulums. At such times his face was beautiful with longing and his eyes became dark and dreamy. "I'm going there, Beauty," he would say as Maud rolled out the word Colorado, or Brazos. "I'm going there. I won't stay here. I'll go, you'll see, and I'll have a big herd of cattle, too."

His gentlest moments were those spent with his sister in the fields or under the trees. As he grew older he became curiously tender and watchful of her. It pleased him to go ahead of her through the woods, to pilot the way and to help her over ditches or fences. He loved to lead her into dense thickets and to look around and say: "There, isn't this wild, though? You couldn't find your way out if it wasn't for me, could you?" And she, to carry out the spirit of the story, always shuddered and said, "Don't leave me to perish here."

Once as he lay with his head in the grass, he suddenly said, "Can't you hear the Colorado roar?"

The wind was sweeping over the trees, and Maud, eager to keep him in this gentle mood, cried: "I hear it; it is a wonderful river, isn't it?"

He did not speak again for a moment.

"Oh, I want to be where there is nobody west of me," he said, a look of singular beauty on his face. "Don't you?"

"N—no, I don't," answered Maud. "But, then, I'm a girl, you know; we're afraid of wild things, most of us."

"Dot Burland isn't."

"Oh, she only pretends; she wants you to think she's brave."

"That's not so." He said it so savagely that Maud hastened to apologize.

His gentlest moments were those spent with his sister — under the trees

SECOND CHAPTER
HIS LOVE AFFAIRS

NATURALLY a lad of this temper had his loves. He made no secret of them, and all the young people in the town knew his sweethearts and the precise time when his passion changed its course. If a girl pleased him he courted her with the utmost directness, but he was by no interpretation a love-sick youth. His likings were more in the nature of proprietary comradeship and were expressed without caresses or ordinary words of endearment.

His courtship amounted to service. He waited about to meet and help his love, he hastened to defend her and to guide her, and if the favored one knew her rôle she humored his fancies, permitting him to aid her in finding her way across a weedy pasture lot or over a tiny little brook which he was pleased to call a torrent. A smile of derision was fatal. He would not submit to ridicule or joking. At the first jocular word his hands clenched and his eyes flamed with anger. His was not a face of laughter; for the most part it was serious in expression and his eyes were rapt with dreams of great deeds.

He had one mate to whom he talked freely, and him he chose often to be his companion in the woods or on the prairies. This was John Burns, son of a farmer who lived near the town. Harry spent nearly every Saturday and Sunday during the summer months on the Burns farm. He helped Jack during haying and harvest, and when their tasks were done the two boys wandered away to the bank of the river, and there, under some great basswood tree on delicious sward, they lay and talked of wild animals and Indians and the West. At this time the great chieftains of the Sioux, Sitting Bull and Gall, were becoming famous to the world, and the first reports of the findings of gold in the Black Hills were being made. A commission appointed by President Grant had made a treaty with the Sioux wherein Sitting Bull was told: "If you go to this new reservation and leave Dakota to the settlers, you shall be unmolested so long as grass grows and water runs."

But the very guard sent in to protect this commission reported "gold in the grass roots," and the insatiate greed of the white man broke all bounds—the treaty was ignored, and Sitting Bull, the last great chieftain of the Sioux, calling his people together, withdrew deeper into the wilderness of Wyoming. The soldiers were sent on the trail and the press teemed for months with news of battles and speeches and campaigns.

All these exciting events Harry and his friend Jack read and discussed hotly. Jack was eager to own a mine. "I'd like to pick up a nugget," he said, but Harold was not interested. "I don't care to mine; I'd like to be with General Custer. I'd like to be one of the scouts. I'd like to have a coat like that." He pointed at one of the pictures wherein two or three men in fringed buckskin shirts and wide hats were galloping across a rocky plain.

Many times, as the two boys met to talk over these alluring matters, the little town and the dusty lanes became exceedingly tame and commonplace.

Harold's eyes glowed as he talked to his sweetheart of these wild scenes, and she listened because he was so alluring as he lay pouring out a vivid recital of his plans.

"I'm not going to stay here much longer," he said; "it's too dull. I can't stand much more school. If it wasn't for you I'd run away right now."

Dot only smiled back at him and laid her hand on his hair. She was his latest sweetheart. He loved her for her vivid color, her abundant and beautiful hair, and also because she was a sympathetic listener. She, on her part, enjoyed the sound of his eager voice and the glow of his deep brown eyes. They were both pupils in the little seminary in the town, and he saw her every day walking to and from the recitation halls. He often carried her books for her and in many other little ways insisted on serving her.

Almost without definable reason the "Wild West" came to be a land of wonder, lit as by some magical light. Its cañons, arroyos and mesquit, its broncos, cowboys, Indians and scouts filled the boy's mind with thoughts of daring, not much unlike the fancies of a boy in the days of knight-errantry.

Of the Indians he held mixed opinions. At times he thought of them as a noble race, at others—when he dreamed of fame—he wished to kill a great many of them and be very famous. Most of the books he read were based upon the slaughter of the "redskins," and yet at heart he wished to be one of them and to taste the wild joy of their poetic life, filled with hunting and warfare. Sitting Bull, Chief Gall, Rain-in-the-Face, Spotted Tail, Star-in-the-Brow and Black Buffalo became wonder-working names in his mind. Every line in the newspapers which related to the life of the cowboys or Indians he read and remembered, for his plan was to become a part of it as soon as he had money enough to start.

There were those who would have contributed five dollars each to send him, for he was considered a dangerous influence among the village boys. If a window were broken by hoodlums at night it was counted against the minister's son. If a melon patch were raided and the fruit scattered and broken, Harold was considered the ringleader. Of the judgments of their elders the rough lads were well aware, and they took pains that no word of theirs should shift blame from Harold's shoulders to their own. By hints and sly remarks they fixed unalterably in the minds of their fathers and mothers the conception that Harold was a desperately bad and reckless boy. In his strength, skill and courage they really believed, and, being afraid of him, they told stories of his exploits, even among themselves, which bordered on the marvelous.

In reality he was not a leader of these raids. His temperament was not of that kind. He did not care to assume direction of an expedition because it carried too much trouble and some responsibility. His mind was wayward and liable to shift to some other thing at any moment; besides, mischief for its own sake did not appeal to him. The real leaders were the two sons of the village shoemaker. They were under-sized, weazened, shrewd, sly little scamps and appeared not to have the resolution of chickadees, but had a singular genius for getting others into trouble. They knew how to handle spirits like Harold. They dared him to do evil deeds, taunted him (as openly as they felt it safe to do) with cowardice, and so spurred him to attempt some trifling depredation merely as a piece of adventure. Almost invariably when they touched him on this nerve Harold responded with a rush, and when discovery came was nearly always among the culprits taken and branded, for his pride would not permit him to sneak and run. So it fell out that time after time he was found among the grape-stealers, or the melon raiders, and escaped prosecution only because the men of the town laid it to "boyish deviltry," and not to any deliberate intent to commit a crime.

After his daughter married, Mr. Excell made another effort to win the love of his son, and failed. Harold cared nothing for his father's scholarship or oratorical powers, but he sometimes boasted of his father among the boys.

"If father wasn't a minister, he'd be one of the strongest men in this town," he said once to Jack. "Look at his shoulders. His arms are hard, too. Of course he can't show his muscle, but I tell you he can box and swing dumb-bells."

If the father had known it, in the direction of athletics lay the road to the son's heart, but the members of the First Church were not sufficiently advanced to approve of a muscular minister, and so Mr. Excell kept silent on such subjects and swung his dumb-bells in private. As a matter of fact, he had been a good hunter in his youth in Michigan, and might have won his son's love by tales of the wood, but he did not.

For the most part, Harold ignored his father's occasional moments of tenderness and spent the larger part of his time with his sister or at the Burns' farm.

Mr. and Mrs. Burns saw all that was manly and good in the boy and they stoutly defended him on all occasions.

"The boy is put upon," Mrs. Burns always argued. "A quieter, more peaceabler boy I never knew except my own Jack. They're good, helpful boys, both of 'em, and I don't care what anybody says."

Jack, being slower of thought and limb, worshiped his chum, whose alertness and resource humbled him, though he was much the better scholar in all routine work. He read more than Harold, but Harold seized upon the facts and transmuted them instantly into something vivid and dramatic. He assumed all leadership in the hunting and upon Jack fell all the drudgery. He always did the reading, also, while Harold listened and dreamed with eyes that seemed to look across miles of peaks. His was the eagle's heart; wild reaches allured him. Minute beauties of garden or flower were not for him. The groves along the river had long since lost their charm because he knew their limits—they no longer appealed to his imagination.

A hundred times he said: "Come, let's go West and kill buffalo. To-morrow we will see the snow on Pike's Peak." The wild country was so near, its pressure day by day moulded his mind. He had no care or thought of cities. He dreamed of the plains and horses and herds of buffalo and troops of Indians filing down the distant slopes. Every poem of the range, every word which carried flavor of the wild country, every picture of a hunter remained in his mind.

The feel of a gun in his hands gave him the keenest delight, and to stalk geese in a pond or crows in the cornfield enabled him to imagine the joy of hunting the bear and the buffalo. He had the hunter's patience and was capable of creeping on his knees in the mud for hours in the attempt to kill a duck. He could imitate almost all the birds and animals he knew. His whistle would call the mother grouse to him. He could stop the whooping of cranes in their steady flight and his honking deceived the wary geese. When complimented for his skill in hunting he scornfully said:

"Oh, that's nothing. Any one can kill small game; but buffaloes and grizzlies: they are the boys!"

During the winter of his sixteenth year a brother of Mr. Burns returned from Kansas, which was then a strange and far-off land, and from him Harold drew vast streams of talk. The boy was insatiate when the plains were under discussion. From this veritable cattleman he secured many new words. With great joy he listened while Mr. Burns spoke of cinches, ropes, corrals, buttes, arroyos and other Spanish-Mexican words which the boys had observed in their dime novels, but which they had never before heard any one use in common speech. Mr. Burns alluded to an aparejo or an arroyo as casually as Jack would say "singletree," or "furrow," and his stories brought the distant plains country very near.

Harold sought opportunity to say: "Mr. Burns, take me back with you; I wish you would."

The cattleman looked at him. "Can you ride a horse?"

Jack spoke up: "You bet he can, uncle. He rode in the races."

Burns smiled as a king might upon a young knight seeking an errant.

"Well, if your folks don't object, when you get done with school and Jack's mother says he can come, you make a break for Abilene; we'll see what I can do with you on the 'long trail.'"

Harold took this offer very seriously, much more so than Mr. Burns intended he should do, although he was pleased with the boy.

Harold well knew that his father and mother would not consent, and very naturally said nothing to them about his plan, but thereafter he laid by every cent of money he could earn, until his thrift became a source of comment. To Jack he talked for hours of the journey they were to make.

Jack, unimaginative and engrossed with his studies at the seminary, took the whole matter very calmly. It seemed a long way off at best, and his studies were pleasant and needed his whole mind. Harold was thrown back upon the company of his sweetheart, who was the only one else to whom he could talk freely.

Dot, indolent, smiling creature of cozy corners that she was, listened without emotion, while Harold, with eyes ablaze with visions of the great, splendid plains, said: "I'm going West sure. I'm tired of school; I'm going to Kansas, and I'm going to be a great cattle king in a few years, Dot, and then I'll come back and get you and we'll go live on the banks of a big river, and we'll have plenty of horses and go riding and hunting antelope every day. How will you like that?"

Her unresponsiveness hurt him and he said:

"You don't seem to care whether I go or not."

She turned and looked at him vacantly, still smiling, and he saw that she had not heard a single word of his passionate speech. He sprang up, hot with anger and pain.

"If you don't care to listen to me you needn't," he said, speaking through his clenched teeth.

She smiled, showing her little white teeth prettily. "Now, don't get mad, Harry; I was thinking of something else. Please tell me again."

"I won't. I'm done with you."

A big lump arose in his throat and he turned away to hide the quick tears of mortified pride. He could not have put it into words, but he perceived the painful truth Dot had considered him a boy all along, and had only half listened to his stories and plans in the past, deceiving him for some purpose of her own. She was a smiling, careless hypocrite.

"You've lied to me," he said, turning and speaking with the bluntness of a boy without subtlety of speech. "I never'll speak to you again; good-by."

Dot kept swinging her foot. "Good-by," she said in her sweet, soft-breathing voice.

He walked away slowly, but his heart was hot with rage and wounded pride, and every time he thought of the tone in which she said "Good-by," his flesh quivered. He was seventeen and considered himself a man; she was eighteen, and thought him only a boy. She had never listened to him; that he now understood. Maud had been right. Dot had only pretended, and now for some reason she ceased to pretend.

There was just one comfort in all this: it made it easier for him to go to the sunset country, and his wounded heart healed a little at the thought of riding a horse behind a roaring herd of buffaloes.

The Gospel Ships of the Prairies

By Waldon Fawcett

ONE of the strangest and yet one of the most effective religious revivals which has ever taken place in this country has been in progress during the past two years along the lines of several of the great Western railroads and is rapidly spreading to others. Of course, practical missionary work of various kinds was inaugurated among the railroaders long ere that, but it was on no such unique plan as that now followed. The present work is being carried on by the men who operate the trains across the plains themselves. There are engineers of the fast mail, train dispatchers, firemen, brakemen and conductors. Said one good-natured reprobate recently:

"This road is getting too good for me. Why, you can't even swear any more when you miss a coupling but some one puts his hand on your shoulder and asks you not to. If it was some missionaryin' cuss you wouldn't need to pay any attention to him, but the worst of it is it's your own familiar friends that's doin' it. And the blame thing's ketchin'."

The Contagion of Railroad Revivals

It all started when Jim Burwick, the Dwight L. Moody of railroad men, went out to the junction town of Ottumwa in the winter of 1898 and began to ask the "boys" there in a very practical way what was the matter with Kansas and all the other States in that vicinity. Now, Jim Burwick runs on the road six months of the year as a freight conductor, spending the remainder of his time in conducting services for railroad men, and he seems to know just how to talk to his fellow-craftsmen. At least he knew just how to talk to the men who dropped into his meetings at Ottumwa. It wasn't very long until train dispatchers were telling each other over the wire at odd moments that the meetings at this and that point were "O. K.," and engineers were nailing up in the cabs copies of the little marked Testaments which were freely distributed.

The interest was indeed "ketchin'." A constantly increasing number of men came out of the railroad service for brief intervals to help along the work, and even the boilermakers and other shopmen began to take a hand. Before the present year was very far advanced the revival was spreading from one end to the other of several of the most extensive transportation systems west of the Mississippi River. In many cases the general morals of towns along the line have been perceptibly improved. The little stories which are told at the "experience" meetings are glimpses into the inner life of the railroader that are as fascinatingly interesting as the tales one hears at a Salvation Army mission in the slums.

Mission Work in a Caboose

One Sunday morning a Burlington engineer asked his conductor to join him for a walk. "I didn't tell you last night," he said, "but your head man was loaded coming in on that last trip. I was afraid you'd fire him, so I let him stay in the cab, and by using the air pretty frequent, and having Jimmy turn the switches, we got in on time."

"Think we can get him saved?" says the conductor.

"Well, we can try."

Then they paid the brakeman a little call, and—well, he didn't lose his job.

While the railroad men are pushing the work of making better railroaders, the promoters of another plan with a somewhat similar object are steadily extending their operations. The chief difference is that the chapel cars are designed to carry an educating and uplifting influence not only to the railroad men of the West, but to the inhabitants of remote, sparsely settled sections as well. Many people in the West who had an opportunity to observe the work will tell you that they believe that these chapel cars are doing fully as much good as the loudly lauded gospel ships plying on the rivers of Africa.

It was fully ten years ago that a wealthy man who made a trip in a private car through the States along the northern border of the country, from Chicago to the Pacific, was impressed with the fact that many of the towns were utterly devoid of religious privileges and opportunities for mental recreation. He told some of his friends about it, and a coterie of men in Wall Street who had a keen eye for other good investments than stocks and bonds, formed the Chapel-Car Syndicate and furnished the funds to build the first car. Now there are a number of these cars in service in all sections of the Western country. The railroads, which are, as a rule, very liberal in any expenditures for the good of the communities along their lines, transport the cars and their attendants free of charge.

Big Dividends of the Chapel-Car Syndicate

The different cars are designated Good Will, Glad Tidings, and other appropriate titles. One car was built from subscriptions received exclusively from women, and another from the contributions made by young men. The cars remain from four days to three weeks at a place. Not only are religious services held, but Sunday-schools are organized, and frequently a movement is started for a young people's organization of some kind. Then, too, people of the community have the benefit, during the stay, of the well-stocked library which is an adjunct to almost every car. The cars will seat only about one hundred persons, but this is adequate, as seldom does a car visit a town of more than five hundred inhabitants, and very frequently a stop is made at a community with only thirty, forty or seventy-five inhabitants.

One or two of the cars such as have been described are devoted almost exclusively to work among the railroad employees. Often they are side-tracked at the repair shop at some junction, and the men attend the opening meeting in their working clothes during the noon lunch hour. Manifestly, it would be unfair to dismiss the subject of the work being carried on in the interest of ambition and progress among railroad men without a word relative to the extensive operations of the rapidly growing railroad branch of the Young Men's Christian Association. The efforts of this organization are, of course, confined largely for the present to the territory east of the Mississippi, but ere long the entire country will share in the benefits of the projects. Special buildings are being erected convenient to repair shops or railroad yards, and every effort is made to enable the railroader to enjoy the privileges of the gymnasium, baths and reading-rooms during the brief interval when he may be waiting to go out on a "run."

Already the effect of these influences is apparent in the gradual evolution of "the new railroad man"—one of the most capable, most intelligent and most interesting types of the American citizen.

RUNNING A CITY ON BUSINESS LINES

By Honorable Bird S. Coler

HON. BIRD S. COLER

IN RECENT years there has been a growing tendency in the larger cities of the country to relax party lines and partisan issues in municipal campaigns, and the chief platform declaration of all parties, factions and candidates has been a promise, usually positive and specific, to apply business methods in the conduct of city government. It has become popular political metaphor to liken a municipality to the property of a corporation, the taxpayers, or the entire population, representing the stockholders, and the elected officers the directors or trustees. To carry the comparison along in logical sequence it would then become the duty of city officers to manage the affairs of the corporation with a view of obtaining the best results for the entire population with the smallest outlay. This is, in the broad sense of the phrase, applying business methods to city government.

But the purpose of management is not identical in the case of a municipality and a private corporation, and methods must therefore differ in a number of particulars. Every private business is conducted for the purpose of making money for the owners, and investments are made and new enterprises undertaken with a view to early and profitable returns upon the capital invested. The affairs of cities are not conducted with a view to the accumulation of property or money for the corporation, and it is often necessary to make large investments from which no return can be expected except better physical and moral conditions for the inhabitants.

No intelligent person will seriously dispute the proposition that the financial affairs of a municipality should be conducted on the same general lines as those of a private corporation; but in applying the system the public officer is confronted at the outset by grave problems over the solution of which public opinion is apparently hopelessly divided.

The Necessity for Home Rule in Great Cities

In my opinion, the first and most important step toward businesslike conduct of city government is complete home rule. Cities that are governed in large part by State Legislatures are invariably badly governed. Urban and suburban interests are constantly in conflict in such cases. The country is jealous and suspicious of the city, and the people of the latter are disposed to be intolerant of the rights and prejudices of rural communities. In every State Legislature the country members outnumber the representatives of the cities, and whenever there is a conflict of interests the municipalities suffer. Large cities become footballs of politics when ruled from the State capitol. Unable to obtain their rights by fair means the temptation to bribery and corruption is often too strong to be resisted.

Every city should have the best charter that statesmanship can devise, and it should be left free to manage all local affairs without the possibility of interference by a superior lawmaking power. In the making of the charter the local interests of a city should be considered, and its growth, development and government should not be hampered by unnecessary restrictions. All the States of the Union, I believe, limit by constitutional provision the power of cities to incur debt. This limitation is fixed by some arbitrary rule and applies to every municipality within the State, without regard to local conditions. This is a relic of State rule that antedates the intelligent study and development of business methods in the government of cities, and in many cases it has become a handicap upon commercial progress.

A good charter for the great city of New York might prove a license for reckless extravagance and corruption in an interior town or village. In fixing the debt limit of cities by constitutional or charter enactment, provision should be made for the proper development of the great commercial and other property interests that are created by the building of large municipalities. Cities ought to have ample power and means to develop to the utmost all public property that is at once a utility and a profitable investment. Money invested by a municipality in the development and operation of property that yields a profitable revenue need not be charged against the borrowing capacity of that city to the same extent as property that does not yield revenue.

How New York is Crippled by Debt Limitations

To make my meaning clearer, I will take the case of the city of New York and some of its investments. New York has expended many millions in the construction of a great system of water-works. The revenue derived from the sale of water is sufficient to pay interest on the bonds issued, to build the plant, and to create a sinking fund sufficient to retire the securities as they fall due. In time the city will own the water-works free of debt and derive from them a large net revenue.

The city has spent $30,000,000 building piers and developing the water front for commerical purposes. Money for this work was borrowed at three and three and one-half per cent. interest.

The modern piers are leased for rentals that in some cases pay the city seven per cent. upon their cost.

If permitted by law the city could expend fifty to one hundred million dollars in the purchase and improvement of additional water front property which would yield a revenue sufficient to pay interest on the bonds and retire them in twenty years. This would greatly facilitate the shipping interests of the city, add largely to its commercial prosperity, and would be the best permanent investment the corporation could make. But under existing constitutional restrictions every bond issued for water-works or dock improvements is a charge against the borrowing capacity of the city, which is limited to ten per cent. of the assessed value of real estate. That is not business, because it prevents the city from making profitable investments on a large scale.

New conditions must be recognized and the proper development of resources that are the common property of the inhabitants of cities must be provided with safeguards that are not mere checks upon prosperity. State Legislatures should not interfere in the government of cities except under extraordinary circumstances.

The Wisdom of Centralizing Municipal Power

I believe, also, and on this point I speak from experience and observation, that in the government of large cities there might safely be less division of power and responsibility. The government should be centralized in the hands of the elected officers, for however bad may be the political conditions of a city it is never an easy matter to elect to office a really bad man. If the important officers of a city have ample authority over all subordinates and are charged with full responsibility for their official acts, the result in time will be that none but capable, honest and independent men will be elected or appointed to office. In regard to the question of labor and employment, wherein lies the most difficult and embarrassing problem connected with the application of business methods to city government, I want to say that Legislatures should interfere there even less than with the regulation of financial questions.

Next to the Federal Government, the city of New York is the largest employer of labor, skilled and unskilled, in the western world. The average number of persons employed by the city is 40,000, of whom almost 10,000 are classed as laborers, or persons unskilled in any art, trade or science, and the average rate of payment for service is higher than that of any other city, state or national government on earth. Of this army of employees, less than 1000 are men of expert knowledge, special education and training that would enable them to command high salaries in private employment. Probably 1000 others are classed as artisans or skilled laborers, 10,000 are school teachers, leaving 18,000 persons engaged in work, not classed as common labor, for which no special education or intelligence is required. For the 10,000 laborers and 18,000 other unskilled employees of the city the average of salaries is $750 a year.

We are prevented by legislation, over which the city authorities have no control, from applying the first principles of business to the affairs of the municipality. In most cases these laws have been enacted by the Legislature without opposition from any source, and they have the support of public opinion. The municipality should be permitted to regulate its own affairs, and under no other system can any uniform business method be established or maintained. In the regulation of the city's pay-roll the State Legislature has been most inconsistent, and has followed no rule of business known in the commercial world.

How New York Could Get Her Money's Worth

As a matter of business pure and simple, the considerations of local pride and sentiment aside, the city of New York, with its great wealth and population, its glorious history and vast possibilities along every avenue of human endeavor, should have the best of everything that can add to the greatness, the glory or utility of a municipality. It should have the best engineering, the best architecture, the best art. It should have the best schools to train its children; it should have the best streets, docks and wharves to facilitate and increase commerce. Its bridges, tunnels and public buildings should be enduring monuments representing the best skill and genius of engineering and architecture, and its parks should be more than breathing spaces; they should be object-lessons of the beautiful, where true art has enriched the handiwork of Nature.

To obtain these results the city must bid against private capital for genius and technical skill. It is the economy of business and in no sense extravagance for the city to employ only the best talent where skill is required. There should be no salary limit if the business of the city requires the employment of the best lawyer, the best architect, the most skilled engineer or the greatest artist. This condition of affairs would soon result from a proper application of business methods to all the details of municipal government.

Another and far more difficult barrier to the application of business methods in city government is the almost universal feeling that public employment is, for one reason or another, different from other service, and less exacting in its requirements. There exists among a majority of the persons employed by cities, as well as among those seeking public service, a feeling, in many cases amounting to conviction, that there rests upon them no moral or business obligation to do as much work as they would for a private employer.

The Logic of the Shirk Employed by the City

The average man who obtains appointment through a civil service examination feels that he is, to the extent of a few merit marks, at least, better qualified for the place than any other applicant, and that he is sure of his job so long as he gets through with his work; the temptation to become a laggard and a shirk is often too strong to be overcome. The man, no matter how honest and energetic, soon falls into a rut and studies to do as little work as possible. He does not feel that he is cheating any one by neglecting his duty. The average man cannot understand why the same rules of service should apply when he works for the public, the city as a whole, as when he works for an individual or private corporation. The shirk is not alone to blame. He is the creature of a condition, and his moral sense is blunted by a public sentiment he did not create.

The remedy for the man and the condition is the strict application of business methods. In the first place, there ought not to be any useless offices or sinecures in any department. Every man appointed to a city office or employed for any minor service should understand that he must do a certain amount of work for fixed pay. His working hours and duties ought to be as clearly defined as if he were employed in a bank or a dry-goods store, and his advancement in position and salary should depend upon his honesty, industry and intelligence.

In brief, cities ought to have the same right and power as the individual or corporation to employ the best help obtainable for the price paid, and should be enabled to recognize and utilize to the utmost special ability in the public service, and should have full power to compel an honest and conscientious day's work for a liberal day's wage. So long as cities pay better wages than private employers they ought to receive as good service, and should have power to compel that service and to remove the shirk, the laggard and the incompetent.

No political power and no civil service regulation ought to keep a man in the employ of a city who is incapable or unwilling to render the same service that would be required of him for like salary in private employ.

This is a simple business proposition, and its application is so fair that no reasonable person could object, yet the benefit to a city, the saving in money, and the improvement in public work would be enormous. The popular feeling that it is not dishonest to draw salary from a city without rendering, in service, value received should be overcome. It is the first and most difficult barrier to the proper enforcement of business methods in city government.

Chances for Young Men in the Philippines

By Frank G. Carpenter

Native plowing

Buffalo teams in Pasa

IF I WERE not in the army I could make $40,000 a year on a capital of $10,000." These words were uttered by General Frederick G. Funston not long ago in the Oriente Hotel, in Manila. We had been chatting of the chances which the Philippine Islands offer to enterprising young Americans. General Funston had just returned from a trip along the coast of eastern Luzon, and he was full of the riches of the country and of its possibilities. He went on to say that the above sum might be made by trading there with the natives, by selling cloths and other goods to the merchants of the various towns, and taking in exchange the products of the country, such as hemp, tobacco, sugar and rice. He then spoke of other lines in which money could be made, and grew enthusiastic as he described the country, the fertility of its soil, and the wealth of its mineral and timber resources.

His view of the opportunities for fortune making here is not an uncommon one. Nearly every practical business American who has investigated the subject expresses a similar opinion, although few would venture to predict such large returns within such a short time.

After a stay of several months, and travels which have covered the principal parts of the Philippine Islands, I am impressed with the enormous development that must come in the near future. As soon as the war is entirely over the country will be opened up along modern lines, and its vast resources will be exposed to the world. At present, the conditions are such as to make most travel and investment unsafe. The principal islands are overrun with brigands and robbers, and it is dangerous to go anywhere outside the cities without a military escort of twenty or more men. The country, however, is fast being pinned down with bayonets, the insurrectos have lost their organization, and the pacification of the people is only a matter of some months. Within a year conditions should have become settled, and then the big, fat oyster of the Philippines will be ready for any one who is big enough and brave enough to attempt to open it.

Shut and Open Fields for Labor and Capital

At the start, I would say that this part of the world has no place for young Americans without money, who have only ordinary muscle and brains as their stock in trade. The common day laborer cannot expect to find work here. He cannot compete with the Chinese or the Filipino. He cannot do hard manual work day after day in the tropics, nor can he live on the twenty-five cents a day which the ordinary day laborer receives. There are also plenty of cheap clerks and bookkeepers here, and ordinary second-class positions of all kinds are easily filled.

When it comes to skilled labor the situation changes. There will be plenty to do for engineers and high-grade mechanics. The land will be opened up by railroads, and it has been estimated that at least one thousand miles of profitable road can be constructed, necessitating an investment of more than $100,000,000. Factories and machine shops will be established, and all sorts of modern improvements will be introduced into the cities, so that plumbers, electricians and mechanics of various kinds will be needed.

As to professional men, there are already American doctors and dentists who have opened offices in Manila and are doing well. They charge high prices for their services, and get them. There are a number of American lawyers who boast many clients, and, in the litigation which is sure to arise in the transfers of landed property, there will be abundant opportunities for others. There will also be places for stenographers and men able to act as foremen and managers of estates. The photographers who are here are making money, and the same may be said of the small traders who are handling American goods.

No one should come to the Philippines unless he has enough money to pay his way here and back home, and no one should come with the idea of staying without enough to enable him to go into some business, even though it be in a small way. Three thousand dollars is the least capital with which the venture should be made. The passage here, supposing the start be made at New York, will cost about $400, and the living expenses in the islands while looking about will be much the same as at home. If the man is disgusted he will need another $400 to take him back, so that he cannot allow much less than $1000 for an experimental trip.

This is a great deal to pay for an experiment, and a young man should think well before he decides. He would better not come unless he has the expectation of spending from ten to fifteen years in making his fortune, if not with the purpose of making the Philippines his home for life. For such men there are many opportunities, and such men are practically the only men who will succeed.

What Little We Know of the Country

But what are the Philippine Islands, and what are the chances which they offer? It is difficult to answer in detail. The country is so little known that it is hard to get an intelligent idea of it, even when on the ground. The Spaniards held it for more than three hundred years, but they have merely skimmed the surface of the more accessible parts. They did not know what they had, and the United States to-day is not able to give accurate figures as to the extent of the land and the character of its resources.

There are large tracts of the islands which have never been explored, and mountainous districts which have never been prospected. But few parts of them have been accurately surveyed, and the actual area has not been scientifically calculated. We only know that the islands number more than a thousand, and that the archipelago is longer from north to south than from our Great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico. We know that it is wider from east to west than from New York to Pittsburg, and that certain of the islands are as big as certain of our greatest States. Luzon, at the north, about equals New York in area, and Mindanao, at the south, is almost as big as Ohio. Panay and Mindoro are each larger than Connecticut, and Negros, Leyte and Cebu would each cover one of our smaller States.

The topography of the Philippine Islands is of a somewhat uniform character. Coasting about through them, you are never out of sight of mountains, many of which are extinct volcanoes. Every large island has its ranges rising from fertile plains along the coast, with extensive tracts of valley and plateaus in the interior. The Philippines, in fact, are made up of valleys and mountains, although some of the valleys are so flat as to be almost plains. The valley of Luzon, just north of Manila, has a slope so slight that its rivers sometimes change their course, now flowing into the gulf of Lingayen at the north, and again flowing southward into the bay of Manila.

Nearly all of the valleys are flooded during the rainy season. The water, loaded with the earth-washings of the mountains, lies for weeks upon the land, dropping its rich fertilizing silt and revivifying it as the Nile does Egypt. Indeed, some of the best lands of the Philippines are of this nature; they raise abundant crops year after year without artificial fertilization. Take, for instance, the Cagayan Valley, of northeastern Luzon, the best tobacco lands in the Philippines. Tobacco is a soil-exhausting crop. In the United States the best tobacco farms are regularly manured, and it is necessary to renew the land by rotation of crops. In the Cagayan Valley tobacco is raised in the same place year after year, and the soil is such that the crops in the older estates are better than those grown on land newly cleared, as the latter are too rich to produce tobacco of the finest flavor.

Present and Future Methods of Farming

So far I have seen no fertilization whatever in the Philippine Islands. Sugar lands and rice lands are cultivated year after year by merely planting and harvesting the crop. No deep plowing is done, and all farming is of the rudest possible character. The agriculture is about the same as was that in Palestine in the days of the Scriptures. The plows are little more than forked sticks, with now and then an iron mould-board attached. The harrows are made of bamboo poles, with the branches left on; a half-dozen such poles are tied together, and the branches scratch the soil as they are dragged over it. The reaping is all done by hand. In many localities the rice is cut a stalk at a time with a little knife which the harvester holds inside his or her hand.

Fully half of the farming is done by the women. The rice is usually hulled by women, who pound the kernels out in a mortar made of a hardwood log. Much of the grain is threshed by piling the straw upon the ground and driving water-buffaloes or ponies over it. Indeed, I have seen men and women jumping up and down upon the sheaves of rice with their feet to thresh the kernels out of the stalks.

Sugar making, which requires such costly machinery in other countries that it takes tens of thousands of dollars to establish a small factory, is, in the Philippines, of the rudest possible nature. Some of the mills are run by water-wheels like those which turn our old-fashioned grist-mills. In others, the motive power is the carabao, or water-buffalo, which is driven round and round, turning the wheels which, after the principle of the ordinary clothes-wringer, squeezes the juice from the cane. Nothing but the lowest grade of unrefined sugar is made; notwithstanding which it is said that the business is so profitable that the planter makes at least twenty-five per cent. annually upon his capital invested.

In the future, modern methods of farming will be introduced, and the profits will be doubled. This is so in almost all branches of agriculture, and it should be especially so in gardening and fruit raising. One of the chief crops of parts of the Luzon Valley, for instance, is tomatoes. You find acres of land planted in them, and the tomatoes are, as a rule, small and knotty. By the use of American seeds, vegetables equal to those raised at home could be produced, and they would command high prices. It is the same with melons, squashes and other things. Cabbages are now imported here from Hongkong. They sell for twenty-five cents in silver each in the Manila markets. Oranges and other fruits are imported, all of which could undoubtedly be raised here.

A country house in Luzon

The Undeveloped Land Resources of the Islands

And what about the lands of the Philippine Islands? Are there good lands in the market, and can they be bought at reasonable prices? Yes. Much of the best land here was owned by the Spaniards, some of whom have already left, and almost all of whom are anxious to get away. There are large tracts held by the natives which are offered for sale, and among these some of the very outskirts of Manila. I was told the other day of a tract of 7500 acres upon which an American had an option price of $112,000 gold. He offered the land to persons in New York for half a million dollars, but his proposition was not accepted, and his option has expired. At the first price the land would have cost about fifteen dollars an acre, and, considering that it was good sugar land, near Manila, it was exceedingly cheap. As an illustration of how the natives handle such property, the owner did not cultivate more than one-third of his estate, and this was farmed out on shares. Nevertheless, his receipts were about $10,000 a year. This appears to have satisfied him, for when he was asked why he did not cultivate the whole of his property, he replied: "Why should I? I cannot spend in one year more than $10,000. Why should I?"

The above should not be accepted as an average price for land in the vicinity of Manila. Some of the property is held very high, but there are lands scattered over the islands which can be gotten for five and ten dollars an acre, and some for much less. I do not pretend to give prices.

Uncut Forests of Mahogany and Rosewood

The opening up of the country by railroads will furnish numerous chances for land speculation. The natives, who are bright enough along their own lines, do not appreciate the increase in value of property which arises from cheap transportation, and during the first years of the new development lands of this character can be acquired at much the old prices.

There is also an enormous amount of land here which belongs to the United States Government. The lands in the mountains and of the out-of-the-way districts have not been taken up. They still belonged to the Spanish Government at the time of our taking possession of the islands, and, by the treaty of Paris, they have become the property of the United States.

These lands include most of the timber of the Philippine Islands, timber which is of enormous value. There are, indeed, few parts of the world which have so much and such valuable hardwood as this archipelago. Mahogany is as common here as pine is in the United States. Woods that in the United States would be cut into sheets and used for veneering are here manufactured into boats and bridges. I have ridden my horse over planks of mahogany and rosewood, and I walk daily upon floors, the boards of which would make excellent piano cases. I have seen houses built of mahogany, with stairs of rosewood and posts of ebony, and I find almost daily some new tree or log, the wood of which has a beautiful grain, but which is almost unknown to commerce.

A street of Jolo

It is difficult to describe the timber resources of the Philippines. Most of the mountains are covered with trees, and there are vast tracts of virgin forest. The timber resources of the great island of Mindanao, which, as I have said, is almost as big as Ohio, are practically untouched. Mindoro is almost all woods, and there are valuable forests in the mountainous parts of Luzon. Some of these trees are easily accessible, while others, owing to their distance from the sea and the fact that certain kinds of the logs are so heavy that they will not float, will not soon pay for their cutting and transportation.

The trees in nearly all the mountainous regions are enormous. I have seen some so big that you could not reach half way around them with your two arms, which rose up to a distance of 150 feet from the ground without a branch. Mahogany boards six feet wide are now and then met with, and I have been told of rosewood logs which were nine feet in diameter, but have so far seen none which approximate this size.

Up to the present time no modern means of exploiting these timber resources have been attempted. The Spanish Government had a heavy tax upon all lumber industries, and the restrictions on cutting the trees were such that the industry was never developed. There are not a dozen sawmills in the whole archipelago, and such a thing as a planing-mill is almost unknown.

Nevertheless, lumber is very high in all Philippine cities, due largely to the rude method of bringing the trees to the market and manufacturing them into lumber. Many of the largest trees are cut down with bolos, knives which somewhat resemble the old-fashioned corn cutters of the United States. The logs are squared in the forest, and are often dragged for miles upon buffalo carts or sleds to the streams. In turning them into boards the sawing is done by hand, the motive power being two Filipinos, and the saw being much like our cross-cut saws, with an upright handle set at right angles to each end. There are millions of feet of flooring in the islands which have been hewed out with the adz. Some of the floors of the best houses of Manila are of this nature. You can see the rough places where the chips have been cut out, but the grain of the wood is so fine that, from daily sweeping and scrubbing, it has taken a polish like that of a plate-glass mirror.

The development of these lumber resources will offer opportunities to many young men with more or less capital, who will establish sawmills and ship lumber all over the world. Some of it is so valuable that it can be exported to the United States and to Europe at a profit. The great market for Philippine lumber, however, will be Asia, and this, with the prospective development of the far East, will increase its demands from year to year. The opening up of China will result in the building of thousands of miles of railroad, necessitating the purchase of millions of ties. During the present year the lumbermen of Burmah received one order from the Chinese for 5,000,000 ties, and that at such a price that the same could have been shipped from the Philippines at a net profit of twenty cents gold the tie, or a million dollars on the specified contract.

The Outlook in the Vast Hemp Industry

One of the most profitable crops of the Philippines is hemp. It brings into the islands about $18,000,000 in silver every year, and it forms an aggregate product weighing more than a quarter of a billion pounds. There are hemp plantations in nearly every one of the islands, and there are large provinces which are supported almost entirely by the hemp industry. There are merchants and exporters who devote themselves to dealing in hemp, and millions of pounds of it are shipped by them annually to the United States. Nearly all our clothes-lines are made of Manila hemp, and vast quantities of it are sent to our grain fields of the Northwest for the binding of grain.

Hemp raising is one of the most attractive as well as the most profitable kinds of farming. The hemp plant is a species of the banana. The plants look just like the banana plants, from which come the fruit sold in our markets. Each plant is composed of many leaves wrapped about a central stalk, and extending, when full grown, to a distance of ten or twelve feet from the ground. Each leaf of the plant is composed of thousands of fibres as fine as human hair, and the harvesting consists in cutting off the leaves, squeezing out the juice or sap, and drying the fibre for the market. The plants are set out six or eight feet apart. It requires three years for them to arrive at maturity. After that they continue to reproduce themselves.

In a cigar factory

The profits of hemp farming are enormous, and when one, in addition to raising the hemp himself, has enough capital to buy of his poorer neighbors, he can do exceedingly well. Only a small portion of suitable land is now in use.

There are vast tracts of uncleared country suitable for the plant. All that is required is some capital and energy, and the waiting of three or four years until the plantation comes into bearing.

A Big Future Open to the Coffee Planter

I believe there is a big future for the coffee planter in the Philippine Islands. The great island of Mindanao is in much the same latitude as Java, and its soil is said to be of the same nature. I saw luxuriant coffee plants about Zamboanga and on the island of Sulu, near by. I visited a plantation containing 35,000 trees, which is, I believe, as fine as any plantation of its age in the world. I have traveled quite extensively through the coffee regions of the West Indies and Brazil, and I have never seen anything which quite equals this plantation in Sulu. The trees are but three years old, the age at which the coffee tree first comes into bearing. Each of these trees will produce this year at least a pound of coffee, and some are so heavily laden that their limbs are breaking down with the fruit. The trees are about three inches in diameter, and are perfectly healthy, although I am told that the coffee plantations of southern Luzon have been ruined by the blight. As to this, however, it is said that a remedy has been discovered within the past year by some man in the Hawaiian Islands, and, if so, there may be opportunities to buy the Luzon plantations at low prices and revivify them.

Another extensive field of investment and work in the Philippine Islands will be in the development of their mineral resources. There are now prospectors moving cautiously here and there through the mountains looking for gold. Small quantities of the metal have been found in many localities, and some promising quartz mines have been located. Extensive coal deposits are known to exist here and there throughout the archipelago, and also veins of copper, iron and lead. In the south an extensive industry is carried on in the shipping of shells to Europe for the making of mother-of-pearl buttons, combs and similar articles, and the same fisheries produce valuable pearls.

The whole Philippines, in short, are an undeveloped empire of agricultural, industrial and mineral wealth, and if they are to remain the property of the United States they will, within the near future, have a development which will be surprising to the world, and which will furnish our young men opportunities for successful ventures along many lines.

Editor's Note—This is the third of a series of articles on Chances for Young Men in the far East, which began in The Saturday Evening Post of March 10.

Mr. Wu's Ideas About America

A Talk with the Chinese Minister at Washington

"THE educated Chinaman who comes to America is not so much impressed with the superiority of your civilization as you might be inclined to imagine. Certain advantages you may have over ourselves, but there are offsets. After all, the object of existence is the pursuit of happiness, and I do not think that people generally are happier in the United States than they are in my country.

"Happiness is a condition of the mind rather than one dependent upon extraneous circumstances. The Chinese have managed to get along until now very comfortably without electric cars and telephones, but we are not so reluctant as is generally imagined to accept what you call 'modern improvements,' and both these instruments of civilization are being rapidly introduced.

"I do not find that the great stores of your large cities are superior to our own, so far as the opportunity of buying what one wants is concerned. On the contrary, it is a rather interesting fact that we are able to buy in China many products of American manufacture at prices less than are charged for the same articles in the United States. That seems odd, doesn't it? Our markets, in which provisions and other food supplies are sold, are at least as good as yours. In our own view, our method of living affords us comforts equal to those which you enjoy. In respect to the clothes we wear, we have an advantage over you. Prejudice aside, I am sure that the costumes worn by men and women in China are handsomer and more comfortable than those which are the fashion in the United States.

"Perhaps it may be said that the American costume is more suitable for work. As for the comfortableness of it, I might speak with more certainty if I had ever tried it on. Our shoes are surely more pleasant to wear than yours; I never heard of a Chinaman who had a corn. Our women compress their feet, and I am not prepared to defend the custom; but how about the habit of tight-lacing adopted by so many American women? It is admitted that tight-lacing constricts the body organs and is a serious injury to health, and yet it is very general in your country. Chinese women, on the other hand, wear no corsets, and not even a belt—nothing to interfere with the normal development of their bodies.

"From the Chinese standpoint, the full-dress costume of American women is extraordinary. What can be the reason for such exposure? I do not understand it. How did it originate? The dress of American women, in my opinion, is not nearly so sensible, so becoming, or so hygienic as that of my own countrywomen.

"The opportunities offered for ability and worth in China are not less than in the United States. A public career presents quite as many attractions. It is not possible in my country for a wood-chopper to become Emperor, but he may rise to the premiership. One thing I may mention incidentally is that the opium evil, which is supposed to be a national vice in China, is not nearly so widespread, nor does it bring in its train such dreadful evils as are caused by alcohol in America."

HON. F. W. HACKETT

O. L. SPAULDING

MARTIN A. KNAPP

The Handling of the People's Money

It was perfectly natural that the recent stealings in Cuba should have been a great shock to the Administration. The curious fact about it was that it affected the public a great deal less than it did the official circles in Washington. There is a general idea born of extravagance on the hustings and in the partisan newspapers that men in office get all they can in any way they can, taking due care to keep within the law. As a matter of fact, no business in the world is conducted upon a more rigid system than the Government of the United States. Every penny has to be accounted for and all the finances are encircled in the red tape of discipline and bookkeeping. It may be that some big politicians and some big corporations rob the Government on large contracts, but woe be to the average man who thinks he can steal from Uncle Sam. The United States Government is to-day the greatest business machine in the world.

We can appreciate the importance of this better when we recall what it was when it began life as a new nation. The Revolutionary War cost this country, according to Professor Sumner, $135,000,000, which, by the way, is not so much as we are expending annually for pensions, and which is much less than we have already paid for our experiences in the Philippines. In addition, it cost France $60,000,000. After the war the condition of our finances was truly distressing. Each of the thirteen States reserved the right to make its own money, levy its own taxes and raise its own armies. Many of these States did not pay their shares of interest upon the public debt, and after eighteen months of effort only one-fifth of the taxes were collected. The new nation had no credit, no business management, and its standing army dwindled to exactly eighty men. Congress led a tramp existence, voting plans that were never carried out, monuments that were never erected. It was not until 1790 that even the glimmer of business methods was seen. Then Hamilton proposed his famous Settlement of the Public Debt, recommending first that the foreign debt of the Confederacy should be assumed and paid in full; second, that the domestic debt of the Confederacy, which was considered worthless, should be paid at its par value, and third, that the debts incurred by the States and still unpaid should be paid in full by the Federal Government.

It rather reconciles us to the politicians of our day to know that these three great propositions, especially the third, were gotten through Congress by a dicker, which was nothing more nor less than the agreement to locate the Capital on the Potomac River.

A Government that Does Almost Everything

In most cases in which the Government has lost money in the past the fault has been the same as that which existed in Cuba. Political favorites were placed in important offices and were not sufficiently watched. In Cuba, of course, it was almost like starting a new government. Possibly it may be that way in the Philippines, but it is quite probable that the supervision will be so strict that every dollar will be accounted for.

The great fact is that we now have assurances of honesty in every department of the Government.

But what is most interesting is the almost incredible multiplication of duties and responsibilities which this Government has taken. When it began it could not even attend to its own bills for its running expenses; now it is doing almost everything under the sun, and in the earth beneath, from running saloons for the soldiers to furnishing religion for the same, from watching potato-bugs to watching the stars, from correct spelling to every form of statesmanship; and for all this it is employing more people than all the soldiers who fought in the Revolutionary War.

We are rapidly approaching an expenditure of two million dollars a day, including Sundays, and the fact that this enormous amount, divided up into tens of thousands of accounts and items, is handled safely is a wonderful tribute to the system and personnel of the Government. The only consolation for the shameful robberies in Cuba is that they could not have occurred in the post-office management of this country.

Uncle Sam as Printer and Publisher

One thing that is mounting up rapidly is the official literature of the Government. Most citizens complain if the President's message fills more than one page of the average newspaper, but they fail to remember that behind that message are thousands of reports and tons of documents. Indeed, if the average man were to attempt to read everything the Government publishes in one year he would have to devote about a half a century to the task, taking eight hours a day for the work of reading. Hundreds of these volumes are beautifully prepared with plates and maps that are works of art. Although the Government printing office and the Government engraving plant are the largest in the world, yet a great deal of work is done by private firms. Simply a résumé of the reports would fill a very large book.

Looking Out for the Commissary

One department of work has a peculiar interest for everybody. It is in the preservation and increase of our food supplies. An illustration of it was seen this spring when shad were so plentiful that they were within the reach of all. No better results have been achieved than in the increase of fish, and every hatchery that does its work well is saving money for the people. Unfortunately, the same service has not been possible for the oyster, but through local laws and a better understanding of oyster culture, the exhaustion of the bivalve which was at one time threatened is being arrested. There was a rather amusing simile in use a few years ago that the oyster, like the buffalo, would soon be a memory in the United States.

When the present century began people did not even know what elements or factors in the soil produce crops. Now the knowledge is universal. Not only that, but the world has been called upon by the Agricultural Department to contribute plants and vines best adapted for development in the different sections of the United States. Some of the finest and most productive horticultural and agricultural districts in the country have been developed from unused land by the scientific work at Washington.

The specialists in the Agricultural Department are always at work chasing every enemy of the food products. There is a Bureau of Animal Industry, and there are divisions of chemistry, entomology, biology, forestry, botany, agrostology—this means the study of grasses and field plants—pomology, vegetable physiology and pathology, soils, public roads, gardens and grounds and seeds. Indeed, there are a few other divisions, and of course more will be added.

Things on the Earth and Beneath

So complete and so varied is the special work of the Government that very soon it will have a history of everything that swims, walks, flies or creeps—elaborate and faithful presentations of animate and inanimate nature. There are some economists who object to the Government going so far into this kind of service. But the intelligence of the country fully approves of it. Majestic and overwhelming as the reports seem to be, they give the data for the textbooks and education of the age.

So much has been done it seems that little remains for exploration and record. All the land has been surveyed, and we know the bottoms of our waters as well as the levels of our fields. But Nature is a worker, and every day makes a change. The shore lines are affected by tides, and the mountains and valleys by the rains, especially when too much timber-cutting leaves them bare. The work will go on as long as the country lasts and is able to pay for it.

The Biggest Department

The largest department of the Government is that about which there seems to be the least public interest. It is the Department of the Interior, and each of its eight divisions—patents, pensions, general lands, Indian affairs, education, railroads, geological surveys and census—has ten times as much work as any Cabinet office had a hundred years ago. At the head of each of these divisions there must be a man of broad experience and active mind. In addition to his other duties, the Secretary of the Interior has charge of the national parks and the supervision of hospitals and eleemosynary institutions. The divisions of railroads under the Department of the Interior is entirely separate from the Inter-State Commerce Commission, of which Hon. Martin A. Knapp, of New York, is chairman.

Testing Gold and Silver Coin

Another department which combines many important duties is that of the Treasury. It engraves and prints money, puts up buildings, runs the life-saving service, collects the taxes, keeps track of navigation, manages the light-house service, runs the marine hospitals, attends to the immigrants, and a great many other things. Most people do not know that this department makes the official examination of the coins. A commission meets at the Mint in Philadelphia and goes carefully into the value of the people's money, but the really important work is done by an assayer, who for a number of years was Dr. Cabell Whitehead, a noted metallurgist, who has recently gone to Nome, Alaska, to report upon its gold. The coinage is kept from debasement in this way: two coins each week from the new minting are sent to the assayer in order that he may find out if they are up to the standard. This is necessary, not only for the protection of the people, but in order that the value of American money may be absolute throughout the whole world. The excellence of the Government's workmanship is shown by the fact that gold coins have been condemned only once in the past ten years, and this was due to ingots made from Spanish gold coin, which either contained a small amount of zinc or had been counterfeited. The whole lot of $125,000 was melted down. On three occasions silver coins have been found deficient.

The duties of leading officers of the Department of the Treasury are numerous. For instance, Assistant Secretary Spaulding is assigned the general direction and supervision of all matters pertaining to the Customs Service, the Bureau of Navigation; the Office of the Supervising Inspector-General, Steamboat Inspection Service; the Office of the Supervising Surgeon-General, Marine Hospital Service; the Office of the Supervising Life-Saving Service; the Division of Customs; the Division of Special Agents, and the Division of Revenue-Cutter Service.

New Cabinet Positions Suggested

Of course the main business of the War Department is to keep the Army in trim, but at the same time it has other duties that demand the best work of experts in all the parts and directions. The Navy, of which the Assistant Secretary is Hon. F. W. Hackett, who recently succeeded Mr. Allen, takes in a thousand and one important things, and is now spending over $60,000,000 a year. All the other departments have their sub-divisions, showing the great number of things this Government has to operate.

Before many years we shall undoubtedly have a department devoted to Commerce. And after that, if not before, there will be another for Manufactures. The country is growing so rapidly, and the problems of expansion have increased the necessity for larger work so greatly that more things will have to be done, and it will take more men to do them. It will be noticed that the new offices which are being created are carrying larger salaries than the old ones. Curious as it may seem, it is harder to get Congress to increase the salary of an existing position than to persuade it to pay a much larger sum for a new place which it may create. Take it all in all, the Government does not pay well for the higher class of work, and thus it is constantly losing some of its best men, who find better remuneration in private work.

MRS. MARY MAPES DODGE

HON. JOHN WANAMAKER

HON. T. E. BURTON

MISS ELIZABETH WALLACE

A Millionaire in Politics

Timothy Lester Woodruff was graduated from Yale College twenty one years ago. He then went through a commercial school, and twenty years ago he went into business for himself. He was the first of his class to send a son back to his alma mater. His son is to graduate from Yale next year. He was the first of his class to make a large fortune. His wealth is estimated at several millions of dollars. Since Mr. Woodruff went to Brooklyn, in 1881, and began his career in politics he has gone forward steadily until he has been twice chosen Lieutenant-Governor of New York.

During his weekly trips to New York from Albany he is the most approachable and at the same time the hardest man for a stranger to find in the metropolis. At the Grand Central railroad station he is met by one of his confidential employees, or a visitor who goes by appointment. On the way to his hotel he talks business. After leaving the hotel he goes from one business headquarters to another—from the upper west side down to Wall Street—and he makes each visit count. He can probably "go through" a package of letters or bundle of documents or pile of contracts as quickly as any man in the country.

The "pink waistcoat" is as closely connected with the Lieutenant-Governor as the white hat was with Horace Greeley, and it has served the same excellent purpose. It has advertised his personality from one end of the country to the other. When the newspaper cartoonists and wits, a few years ago, were drawing pictures of and making jokes about Mr. Woodruff's gorgeous raiment they did not stop to think that this same Mr. Woodruff is one of the largest buyers of advertising space in the American press, and that few men understand better the value of printers' ink. The truth is, the pink waistcoat was largely an imaginative creation.

It was as a tranquilizer that the Lieutenant-Governor won his fame in local politics. On one never-to-be-forgotten occasion he threw open his beautiful town house to the leaders of two widely differing branches of the Republican party. A discreet butler stood at one door and an able politician at another, and they divided the callers as they arrived by factions, and sent one into the right drawing-room and the other into the left. So quietly was this done that neither party knew the other was present. Before dinner was announced Mr. Woodruff had made a number of visits to each band of disputants, and the moment a compromise was effected the great doors were opened wide and peace was cemented over a perfect dinner.

After Mr. Woodruff built the famous cycle path from the Brooklyn Bridge to Coney Island, which he accomplished as Park Commissioner, he was easily the most popular man on Long Island, and his election as Lieutenant-Governor followed. With this came the control of the Republican party in Kings County, as Senator Platt's chief assistant. During the last campaign he made his first speech. It was a public debate which was forced upon him by an eloquent Democratic antagonist who had no idea his challenge would be accepted. But it was as soon after it was received as the letter could be written, and with the acceptance went a check for $750, one-half the rent for the use of the largest public hall in Brooklyn. The Democrats were fairly taken off their feet, as also were some of the Republicans, who did not know the Lieutenant-Governor's capabilities. On the appointed night the challenger wore an evening suit and clothed his speech in the finest grade of oratorical habiliments. When he had ended the stalwart "Governor," dressed in his business clothes, walked to the footlights. The galleries broke into tumultuous applause. Mr. Woodruff raised his hand, beckoning for silence.

"Give me a chance, boys," he said, "and I'll be with you in a minute."

And he was. His speech was the chief political surprise of the campaign. It was logical, forceful, humorous, witty and eloquent, and since then Mr. Woodruff has been in demand the country over as a public speaker.

In business Mr. Woodruff is a believer in the value of young men's work. He has surrounded himself with men in the early prime of life and many of them he has trained in his business from the start. The "Governor" also believes in mental concentration. He does whatever he has to do with all his might. He demands the same kind of service.

How Burton Withdrew a Juror

One of the members of the lower house of Congress who well exemplifies the amount of industry which may be expended upon legislative tasks is the Honorable Theodore E. Burton, who occupies the chairmanship of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Very few people have any conception of the number of harbors and rivers and bays there are in this broad land, or how determined are the citizens in the vicinity of each that their particular waterway shall receive a generous appropriation. Almost all the spare time of Chairman Burton is taken up in listening to delegations who come to Washington with some such mission. The program for a single day during the recent session will show how Mr. Burton's time was taken up. He had breakfasted by eight o'clock. By nine the morning mail had been disposed of, and soon after he was engaged with the first delegation. All day the representatives of commercial bodies and committees of chambers of commerce kept coming in a steady stream, and it was with difficulty that the hard-worked chairman stole ten minutes at noon for lunch. Dinner did not consume a much longer period, and the evening was given over to a political caucus. When Mr. Burton returned to his apartments at midnight he found two reporters waiting to interview him. One of them asked incidentally how he managed to get through so much work. "Well," replied the chairman with a smile, "I attribute it to the fact that I sleep so excellently. Some nights I get as much as six hours sleep."

Chairman Burton comes from Ohio, and from Senator Hanna's own city. He was defeated once by that unique figure in politics, Tom D. Johnson, but at the next election he returned the compliment. You would scarcely think from his appearance that he is approaching the half century mark. He is a lawyer by profession, a student by instinct and a bachelor from preference. Early in his career in Washington, in order to carry a seemingly unimportant point in debate, he translated in full a French technical work as large as an ordinary novel.

One particularly amusing incident characterized Congressman Burton's early experience at the bar. For some reason it became necessary to request a continuance in a case in which he was counsel. After Mr. Burton had explained why there should be a continuance the court told him simply to withdraw a juror and the case would be marked continued. For the moment the young attorney was nonplused, but after glancing at the court to satisfy himself that the judge was in earnest, he walked over to the jury box, eyed the jurors for an instant and then firmly seized a large, portly German and endeavored with no little effort to drag him out of the jury box. In the midst of the general laugh which followed, the court came to the rescue of the discomfited young barrister by explaining that the term was simply technical and need only be written on the docket.

Women in Summer Work

Never before were so many women taking part in the numerous summer schools as this year. At Chautauqua, for instance, there are several dozens of them, and at the large universities they almost equal in number the male members of the faculties. For instance, one of the important departments of the Summer School of the University of Chicago will be under the direction of Miss Elizabeth Wallace, who has won a high place for her scholarship and her ability to interpret it in an interesting way.

It takes special aptitude to teach the summer courses, but the difficulties are fully repaid by the appreciation and cooperation of the students, who go to school in summer to study and not simply as a recreation.

Mrs. Dodge's Little Admirer

One day on a railroad train Mrs. Mary Mapes Dodge sat beside a girl about fourteen years of age. When the newsboy with his books and magazines appeared, the little passenger asked her grandfather to buy a magazine which contained one of the installments of Mrs. Dodge's most successful story, Donald and Dorothy. Naturally, Mrs. Dodge watched the results with the keenest interest, and when she saw the girl had nothing with which to cut the pages she opened her satchel to find a substitute for a paper knife. Finally, seeing one of her own visiting cards, there came the happy thought of offering it and of watching for the surprise that would follow as a climax to the incident. The girl took the card, carefully cut the pages of the magazine, and then returned it with a smile and a bow, becoming absorbed again in the story.

She does not know to this day that the famous author was the kind lady sitting next to her, and the famous author tells the incident as a joke upon herself.

The Wanamaker Propulsive Handshake

John Wanamaker's recent act in ordering out of his office two local politicians who tried to bulldoze him led the former Governor of one of the Western States to tell a story.

"I almost believe," he said, "that Mr. Wanamaker could have gotten them out as well by giving each of them one of his official handshakes. When he was Postmaster-General I was in Congress, and went to see him a great many times; in fact he had more calls than any other member of the Cabinet of the Harrison Administration. The way he received everybody was most satisfactory, but the thing that delighted me was the beautiful manner in which he got rid of a visitor. His farewell handshake was courtesy and geniality itself, but at the same time it was a gentle push toward the door. It was done in such a manner that nobody could possibly take exception to it. A while afterward I became Governor of my State. I had seen the thing worked so well in the Postmaster-General's office that I thought I would try it. Of course, you know, when the Legislature meets, the Governor of a State has quite a few people to handle. I practiced a little on my wife, and thought I had got the hang of the performance, although she expressed her doubts. The day when I tried the experiment I began on an old political supporter, grasping his hand firmly, and with my best smile I gave him the gentle push. But the results were not altogether what I had hoped. He gazed at me steadily for a moment and then said: 'It's all right, Governor, if you want me to go, but I don't want to be thrown out.'

"'Come back here,' I exclaimed, and grabbed his hand in the old way, and gave him a pull toward me. Then, in order to remove any other doubts he may have had I made him promise to take dinner that day at the Executive Mansion. It was the first and last time I tried the Wanamaker handshake. He can do it, but I don't believe there is anybody else in the world who has the subtle genius necessary to perform it successfully."

The Princeton Corkscrew Market

Doctor Patton, President of Princeton University, is more noted for the logic of his sermons than the wit of his speeches. But he can be very humorous on occasion. In an after-dinner speech, discussing the advisability of advocating local prohibition in Princeton, he said, "Local prohibition would only create a market for corkscrews." Last summer he decided to shave off his side whiskers, which he had worn for many years. After shaving off the left side he went to his bedroom where his wife was sitting and said: "My dear, I shaved one side. If you like it I'll shave the other."

Doctor Beecher's Consolation for Burdette

When "Bob" Burdette started out to lecture he struck the same town as Henry Ward Beecher, who sent for him.

"Well, young man, how do you like it?"

"Mr. Beecher," he replied, "it is awful. I nearly die every night from nervousness."

"Let me console you, then. The longer you lecture the more nervous you'll get." And "Bob" declares it is true.

The Kidnaping of President Lincoln

By Joel Chandler Harris

Copyright, 1900, by The Curtis Publishing Company

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS CHAPTERS.—Francis Bethune, a cashiered officer of the Confederacy anxious to retrieve himself, volunteers upon a dangerous mission within the Union lines. Openly, and under a guarantee of safe conduct from Abraham Lincoln, he is to bring back with him an imprudent young woman who has attempted to supply the Confederate Government with information; secretly, he hopes to abduct the President. Taking with him a sealed and addressed envelope given to him by Mr. Phil Doyle, concerning whom he can discover little, he goes to Washington, via New York and the "Western Route," with only a single companion, Mr. Billy Sanders. On the train he meets a former townsman, in whose care, knowing himself recognized, he places himself. This gentleman, Waldron Awtry, takes him direct to the White House, introduces him to Lincoln, and places before him the ostensible purpose of his mission.

PART THIRD

WHEN Bethune and Mr. Sanders were ushered into the room, Elise clapped her hands together as the soubrettes do on the stage, gave a smothered scream supposed to represent joy, and fell upon Francis Bethune and kissed him until he wished himself well out of the uncomfortable position.

"Francis!" she cried, "allow me to present you to my dear, dear friend, Mrs. Lincoln. My nephew, Mrs. Lincoln. And here is Mr. Sanders! Oh, you dear, good man! you make me feel quite at home. Mrs. Lincoln, this is my dear old friend, Mr. Sanders. Are both of you prisoners, too? Oh, isn't it glorious to suffer for one's country?"

Bethune looked at Mr. Lincoln. The President was standing with his hands clasped behind him. He was not smiling, but there was a comical expression on his face. Mrs. Lincoln was laughing unrestrainedly, and it was very evident to Bethune that the Lady of the White House had found Elise Clopton sufficiently amusing. His irritation was such that he could scarcely refrain from showing it in words. Youngster as he was, it seemed to him that the whole South was here on exhibition in the person of his frivolous aunt. He was on the point of saying something regrettable when Mr. Sanders stepped in, as it were.

"You don't look like you've been sufferin' for your country much. Appearances is mighty deceivin' if you ain't been havin' three square meals a day—fried meat an' biscuit an' hot coffee for breakfast, collards an' dumplin's an' buttermilk for dinner, an' ashcake an' molasses for supper."

"You see how the men mistake us," protested Elise, turning to Mrs. Lincoln. "Our keenest anguish is mental, but the men never think they are suffering unless they are in physical pain. And the men think the women are too timid to take any risks. Look at me, Mr. Sanders."

"I see you, Leese," said Mr. Sanders so dryly that Mrs. Lincoln burst out laughing.

"Don't mind him, dear friend; he always was comical. And then there was your grandmother, Mr. Sanders, Nancy Hart. Didn't she suffer for her country?"

"She stayed at home an' hit the Tories a lick when they pestered her, two for one, maybe; but she didn't complain of no sufferin' so fur as I know. The sufferin' was all wi' them that pestered her. Anyhow, we've come to take you home, an' when we git there I'm goin' to build a pen to keep you in. Goodness knows, I don't want to be runnin' my head in no more hornets' nests."

"Why, you don't call this a hornets' nest, I hope?" said Mrs. Lincoln, smiling.

"By no manner of means, mum," replied Mr. Sanders with a bow. "This is the only homelike place I've struck sence I left Shady Dale. But I hear you're a Southerner, an' Mr. Lincoln is Georgy all over, an' that accounts for it. If we wa'n't here, where'd we be?"

"Well, we'll go back now and talk about Georgia," said Mr. Lincoln. "To-morrow or the next day we'll arrange about the lady's journey home."

"Yes; I am willing to go now," said Elise dramatically; "I have performed my duty; I have risked my life for my native Southland."

"If you only knew what a close call it was, you'd doubtless be prouder still, I reckon," remarked Mr. Lincoln with a smile.

With that Bethune and Mr. Sanders bade the ladies goodnight and followed the President to his private office, where Waldron Awtry awaited them. They were for returning to the hotel at once, as the hour was growing late, but Mr. Lincoln would not hear to it unless they were willing to admit that they were tired of his company. There were nights, he said, when sleep flitted away from his neighborhood, and refused to be coaxed back, and this, he thought, would prove to be one of those nights.

First he wrote out a new certificate for Francis Bethune, as well as a document to insure the safety of Mr. Sanders, and then he began to talk about Georgia sure enough, addressing his conversation mainly to Mr. Sanders, whose comments he appeared thoroughly to enjoy. He asked about the people, their views and hopes. Once he declared that if the people of the South knew his intentions and desires as well as he did himself, he believed they would put an end to the war and come back into the Union.

"But what about the politicians?" inquired Mr. Sanders.

"That's a fact!" exclaimed Mr. Lincoln; "the politicians and the editors. We have 'em here, too. Oh, I was just telling you of a dream I once had."

"An' then, ag'in, you're a Ab'litionist, Mr. President," said Mr. Sanders.

"Well, that matter has been settled, so far as I can settle it, but, up to a few months ago, that question was a mere matter of moonshine compared to the Union. I said as much to Horace Greeley, and he and his friends had a good many duck-fits about it. All the Government doors have big keyholes except Stanton's. Well, Abolitionism was a great question, but it was small compared with the preservation of the Union. All other political questions are small by the side of that."

They talked until some time after midnight, with occasional interruptions from messengers connected with the War Department, or with some of the committees of Congress. Once Mr. Lincoln, after receiving a telegram, held it open in his hand and was silent a long time. Finally he folded it lengthwise many times and then wrapped it around his forefinger, holding it in place with his thumb.

"It has got so now," he said, breaking the silence, "that I can tell by the rumble of the wheels whether the man in the carriage is fetching good news or bad."

The President made no remark about the contents of the telegram, but he fell into such a state of abstraction that Bethune nodded to the others, and simultaneously they all arose and bade him good-night. He no longer urged them to stay, but asked them to return early the next day, saying that he wanted to have a good long talk with "friend Sanders."

When Bethune and Mr. Sanders went to breakfast the next morning they were escorted to a table at which sat John Omahundro, who saluted them in the most familiar manner. Bethune, whose temperament lacked that offhand heartiness which is sometimes attractive and sometimes repelling, bowed coldly. Mr. Sanders, who was heartiness itself on almost every occasion, smiled vacantly at Omahundro, remarking: "I've seed your face some'rs, I reely do believe."

"Why, certainly," said Omahundro in his drawling voice; "I traveled with you from Albany to New York."

"That's so!" exclaimed Mr. Sanders; "you're the feller that helt the 'oman's baby while she give it castor-ile. Well, you're a mighty handy man, but I've been in sech a buzz an' racket, an' seed so many folks that I'd 'a' never know'd you ag'in."

They talked on indifferent subjects until the meal had been dispatched, and then they sat in the reading-room of the hotel and talked business.

"What about your program? It's foolhardy, but I'm willing to go into it on conditions—I mean this kidnaping business."

"It's as easy as falling off a log," replied Bethune.

"Lots easier," remarked Mr. Sanders; "but——"

"Now you're beginning to say something. But—but how are you going to get away? You don't know a step of the road. How are you going to get Mr. Lincoln safely to the South?"

"Trust to luck, I reckon," replied Bethune.

"What I was tryin' to say when you jumped in betwixt me an' my words was that the job is easy, but 'twould be a pity to put it through."

"You've said something again," remarked Omahundro. "Mr. Lincoln has the hardest time of any human being I ever saw. He reminds me of my father."

"He puts me in mind of all the good men I've ever know'd. He takes 'em all in," said Mr. Sanders.

"He's a good deal like you," Bethune declared.

"Well, I wish to the Lord I was more like him," said Mr. Sanders solemnly. "I'll tell you what, fellers, that man has looked trouble in the eye so long that he pities ev'rybody in the world but hisself. Frank, I'll go into this business if you'll le' me do the engineerin'—if you'll put it in my hands."

"Oh, I've no objection to that," assented Bethune with a short laugh. "He's so different from what I expected. By George! don't you believe it would break his heart to be taken away from here?"

Mr. Sanders pursed up his mouth and looked at the ceiling. "No-o-o, 'twouldn't break his heart," he announced after some reflection. "He's a good, strong man, an' from the look he has in his eye, he's seen so much trouble that he's ready to shake hands wi' it wherever he meets it, knowin' purty well that he'll git some fun out'n it somehow or some'rs. You leave it to me, Frank—leave it to me."

"Well," said Omahundro, "if it's to be done, to-morrow night is the time, between ten and twelve—the nearer ten the better. Mr. Stanton usually calls about half-past twelve or one. Mr. Lincoln may ask you to stay to supper. If he does, say yes, and thanky, too. If you take supper here, a carriage will be waiting for you at the door. If there is more than one vehicle near the hotel entrance, the driver on your carriage will say, 'Whoa, Billy!' If you don't take supper here, the carriage will drive into the White House grounds precisely at ten o'clock. The driver of the carriage will stay with it until he hears pursuers or until you meet another conveyance in the road driven by a country chap. If you are pursued, one of you must be on the driver's seat to take the lines when my man retires, and then you'll have to take the consequences and get out the best way you can. I tell you candidly, I don't see how you are going to get out with the President, and but for orders from Captain McCarthy I wouldn't make a move in it. I'm fond of Mr. Lincoln; I feel like he's kin to me."

"Well, there are bigger principles at issue than kinsfolk and Presidents," remarked Bethune with some emphasis.

"That's so," assented Mr. Sanders, "but I wish from my heart he was more like some of the other Presidents we have had in North Ameriky."

"Good-night," said Omahundro. "We may never see one another again. I'm going to help you out all I can, but I can't say that I wish for your success."

"Nor me, nuther," commented Mr. Sanders.

The next day found Bethune and Mr. Sanders at the White House. While Mr. Lincoln was busy they walked about the grounds with Elise Clopton. They were not in a very gay humor, as may well be supposed, and it was a relief to their minds to listen to the lady's chatter. She related her experiences from the time she left Shady Dale to visit her family in Maryland, and, if her reports were correct, she had been through many daring adventures. She was quite a heroine in her own estimation, and there is no doubt that, frivolous and giddy as she was, she possessed both courage and presence of mind. Mr. Stanton paid her a high tribute when he told Mr. Lincoln that she was quite the most dangerous and daring spy that had operated around Washington, and he wanted to make an example of her.

As Mr. Sanders had remarked on more than one occasion, there were good points about the lady if you didn't have to live on the same lot with her. Curiously enough, she had conceived a romantic friendship for Mr. Lincoln.

"Isn't he the dearest man?" she said to her companions as they strolled about, enjoying the warm sunshine. "I think he is just grand. I am dead in love with him. Oh, he is the most fascinating human being I ever saw. I used to hate him"—clasping her hands and throwing her head back—"and now I love him. How can our newspapers abuse him as they do?"

Presently Tad, Mr. Lincoln's little son, came from the rear of the house with his goats, and was soon joined by his father. Elise wanted to go where they were.

"Now, Leese, don't let's make geese of ourselves," said Mr. Sanders. "The man hardly has time to speak to his family. Let him alone."

"Oh, don't you believe that," said Elise. "Why, he's the most devoted man to his family I ever saw. He allows them to impose on him right and left. It's perfectly grand to see how patient he is. And look at that child's clothes; see what a misfit they are."

"It's the fashion, I reckon," responded Mr. Sanders.

Elise laughed merrily. "The fashion! Why, the world never saw such a fashion as that."

"Well, a President and his family don't have to be in the fashion. When it comes to that, they're mighty nigh as independent as me, I reckon."

The President heard Elise Clopton laugh and, seeing Bethune and Mr. Sanders with her, joined the group, Tad following with his horned team.

"You seem to be worried this morning, Mr. Lincoln," said Elise with one of her brightest smiles.

"Yes; we all have to worry about something, at some time or other," replied the President. "There's a man down in Tennessee they are trying to hang because he wandered off from camp one night, and his mother's at this end of the line crying her eyes out. I've spent half the morning trying to get a dispatch to the officer in command. Before they hang or shoot the boy, I want to see the record. But it's all right now," he said with a sigh.

They walked a little while in silence. Finally Mr. Lincoln turned to Mr. Sanders: "Does your President have much opposition?"

"Not among them that he can get his hands on. But Joe Brown is after him with a sharp stick, an' Bob Toombs rares around, an' they manage to keep the water warm, if not a-b'ilin'. The States' rights plaster does purty well when you slap it on some un else, but when the other feller slaps one on to you, it burns like fire."

"How is that?" Mr. Lincoln asked, his eyes fairly dancing with amusement.

"Well, Jeff Davis was put in to slap the States' rights plaster on to you-all, an' now he can't hardly git a law passed but what Joe Brown bobs up wi' a States' rights plaster an' slaps it on to Mr. Davis." Mr. Lincoln roared with laughter. "I don't think it's fair," Mr. Sanders went on, "but some of the boys apperiently git a good deal of fun out'n it."

The President's unrestrained laughter attracted the attention of Tad, who left his goats to the temporary care of Elise and went running to Mr. Sanders. "I wish you'd stay here all the time," he said in a pleading tone.

"What for, I'd like to know?" inquired Mr. Sanders, lifting the lad in his strong arms.

"Because you make papa laugh," replied Tad. "He laughs that way with me sometimes, but I want to hear him laugh that way when he's with grown people."

"That puts me in mind of the little chap that wanted a candy elephant," said Mr. Sanders. "He worried about it so till his pappy sent off an' bought a dollar's worth of sugar, an' his mammy put it in the preserve kettle, poured in a couple of gourdfuls of water, an' stewed it down, an' then, after so long a time, took it out, pulled it the best she could, an' then built it up into some kind of animal that a blind man might take to be a rough imitation of a wooden elephant. Then she called in the little chap an' turned the elephant over to him. Well, he took this elephant out to the woodshed an' started in on him, but he hadn't gnawed his way no furder than one of the hind legs till he was the sickest boy you ever saw; an' after that he'd turn pale an' cry if anybody so much as said 'candy elephant' to him."

"And no wonder!" exclaimed Tad.

"That's a fact," responded Mr. Sanders; "no wonder. An' I wouldn't be here a week before your pappy would pull out his hankcher an' cry if he so much as heard the name of Sanders."

"Would you?" cried Tad, turning to his father.

"Why, certainly not," replied the President. Satisfied, the lad slipped from Mr. Sanders' arms and went skipping to his goats. "I'll tell you the truth, my friend," Mr. Lincoln went on, laying a familiar hand on Mr. Sanders' shoulders, "you have no idea what a joyous relief it is to meet a man who knows how to say things and who doesn't want a post-office for himself, or his wife's cousin, or who doesn't want to take command of all the armies in the field, or take entire charge of the Government, or who hasn't some complaint to make, or some objection to offer—why, it's like seeing the sun again after a couple of months of rainy weather."

"I reckon it's wuss now than ever before," remarked Mr. Sanders. They were walking along together, Bethune having lagged behind, intent on his own reflections.

"Yes, I reckon it is," said Mr. Lincoln. "If it wasn't for Stanton, who likes to have his hand in everything, I don't know what I'd do. He can stand up to more hard work and worry than any man I ever saw. Now, if you had a machine, full of intelligence, that was greedy for all the work you could pour into the hopper, you wouldn't mind it much if it pinched your fingers once in a while, or took off a finger-nail now and then, would you?"

"I jest reckon not," responded Mr. Sanders with emphasis.

"Well, that is the reason I take no offense when Stanton cusses me out behind my back, or when he cuts up his capers before my face."

"I see," said Mr. Sanders. "When you want to bluff some feller that's a little too smart, you fetch out Stanton. It puts me in mind, in some ways, of Roach's race-hoss."

"How was that?" Mr. Lincoln inquired.

"Why, there was a young chap in our settlement by the name of Waters, an' he had a quarter-hoss that he vowed an' declared could outrun anything on four legs, includin' a steam engine. Well, he bragged about his hoss an' went on so that one day old man Johnny Roach, who had about a thimbleful too much of dram, up'd an' said he had a racer that could beat Waters' hoss so fur that he'd turn an' meet him half way comin' back. Waters hankered him for a bet an' a trial, an' he got both. They set the day, an' when the time come Waters was there, an' presently Uncle Johnny's youngest boy come gallopin' up on a steer.

"Now, ev'rybody in the county know'd the steer. He was old as the hills, but he was game, an' his horns was a plum cur'osity. From the p'int of one to the p'int of t'other was mighty nigh nine feet, an' he had a way of shakin' 'em that made folks stan' 'roun'.

"Waters begun to take water right off. Says he, 'That ain't no hoss.'

"'I never said he was a hoss,' says old man Johnny; 'I said he was a racer.'

"'Well, he ain't no racer,' says Waters.

"'That's yit to be decided,' says Johnny Roach. 'The money's up,' says he, 'an' I'm gwine to walk off wi' it.'

"Waters hem'd an' haw'd, but it didn't do no good. 'Git ready!' says old man Roach. 'Some of you men give the word.'

"'Well,' says Waters, 'I dunner whether your steer can run or not; beat or git beat, he's liable to do some damage, an' I'll not run my hoss ag'in him.'

"So Roach's boy rode the steer over the course, an' old man Johnny poled off home with the stakes in his pocket."

Mr. Lincoln seemed to enjoy this anecdote very much. He said there was a very pungent moral in it which could be given a variety of applications, and he forthwith added it to his already large collection of stories.

All this while Bethune was wandering about the lawn with head hung down like a boy with the posts. He was thinking hard, and his thoughts were not pleasant ones. Nan Dorrington gazed at him through the mists of memory with sad eyes. Of the many familiar faces he could remember, only one seemed to wear a smile—and that was the face of Miss Puella Gillum. Bethune came to Washington, it will be remembered, to seize and carry off the President. He had, in fact, hit upon the only plan which was in the least likely to paralyze the North, bring about peace and establish the Confederacy. Though the Georgian was a young man, he had tolerably fair judgment; and he had already seen that this patient, kindly man, with the bright smile and sad eyes, with Melancholy at one elbow and Mirth at the other, was the sole mainstay and reliance of the vast machine that was carrying on the war; that but for his prevision and tact, the halls of the Capitol and the corridors of the departments would swarm with relentless and ruinous factions.

It was true that Bethune's head was full of romantic notions. He had descended from a chivalrous race, and had been reared in a region where chivalry and knightly courtesy were very real things to those who aspired to them, and he now felt himself pulled about by conflicting emotions. He was keen to perform some feat or accomplish some result that would advance the Southern cause, and here was the opportunity. And yet the bare idea of carrying it out left a bad taste in his mouth. He was at war with himself. He felt, in a dim, vague way, that the President was the heart of a mystery, the centre of a wonderful problem. As in an old picture, a light from some unseen source appeared to fall on the worn face of this man, who, born with "the wolf at the door" and in the most abject surroundings, had been lifted up to guide the nation.

Bethune had been so wrapped up in his own reflections that his Aunt Elise could hardly make him hear when she called him. He lifted his head and sighed, and then a frown fell on his face as he realized that she was speaking to him. Her frivolity irritated him, her gushing volubility oppressed him.

"Frank! oh, Frank!" she called, laughing; "pray stop thinking about your sweetheart, and come with me. The President told me I was not to go outside the gates. But I'm going now just to see what he'll say. Won't you come with me?"

For answer Bethune turned sharply away from his aunt. She ran after him. "Don't be so cross, Frank!" she cried. "It's not becoming to you. I wasn't going at all. You and old Billy Sanders, between you, will cause the people here to think I have no standing in my own family. Both of you are very rude. What have I done to deserve it?"

"Now, about this kidnaping business," he remarked

This last remark was spoken with some show of temper, for the beautiful Elise could be spiteful at times.

"Nothing, Aunt Elise," replied Bethune; "but in your position a little more dignity would be suitable."

Elise laughed loudly, but her face was red with indignation. "A professor of etiquette!" she cried. "Before you try to teach me etiquette, nephew, do you learn to be polite and agreeable."

Mr. Lincoln, talking with Mr. Sanders some distance away, noticed by the actions of Bethune and his aunt that something was wrong. "What's the matter with our young friends?" he asked. "They seem to be quarreling."

"Well, it's a family fuss, I reckon," replied Mr. Sanders. "Frank was never fond of Leese, nor she of him."

"The lady seems to be somewhat flighty," remarked the President, "but I've remarked the symptoms in so many charming women that I rarely notice it now."

Mr. Sanders pursed his lips as your country lawyer does when he is about to make some remark which he thinks is unusually profound. "Leese is about as good as the common run, I reckon. She's not nigh as flighty as she looks to be. A right smart of it is put on, same as her clothes. When you come to know her, she's got lots of good p'ints. I don't like her much, but I dunno but that's my fault."

"Likely enough it is," said the President. "I've had a great opportunity to find out what people think of me; nine out of ten misjudge or misunderstand my words, my actions and my motives. You should be President for a little while, friend Sanders, just for the fun of the thing."

"Me!" exclaimed Mr. Sanders; "would I have to have a Secretary of War?"

"Why, certainly; that's a part of the game."

"Well, you'll have to excuse me. I don't mind takin' a turn at checkers, or marbles, or mumble-peg, but that's about the limit of my appetite. No, sir! no playin' President for me if there's a Secretary of War in the game. I may have to tousle your'n before I leave this town; if I do, an' it don't hurt your feelin's too much, I aim to make a clean, healthy job of it."

Mr. Lincoln laughed and excused himself. A great many people had passed them by, going to the White House, some on business, some moved by curiosity, and some impelled by interest and sympathy.

"It takes a heap of people to make a world, friend Sanders," said the President, as he turned away, "and I must go and examine some more of the specimens. When you get ready to come in, Miss Brandon—I mean Mrs. Clopton—will show you how to avoid the crowd. I hope," he said, pausing again, "that you'll take dinner with us. Maybe you'd prefer to call it supper."

"About what time, Mr. President?"

"Early candlelight," replied Mr. Lincoln with a twinkle in his eye. The phrase was so familiar that the Georgian took it as a matter of course.

"Any gal company?" inquired Mr. Sanders.

"No, I think not. Mrs. Lincoln will have some of her friends to dine with her, and we can have a snug little dinner of our own. We'll have a member of Congress who was in Georgia once, and Stanton threatens to come, too."

"Well, I dunno about Frank Bethune, but none of 'em can turn my stomach."

"Stanton says he wants to discover whether you are fish, flesh or fowl," remarked the President, smiling.

"Jest tell him I'm a plain old snappin'-turtle from Georgia wi' red eyes an' cold feet." Mr. Lincoln turned away laughing, and Mr. Sanders was left alone until little Tad came along driving his goats. He fell into conversation with Mr. Sanders, and the talk was so interesting to both of them that they sat flat on the grass. They went from one subject to another until Mr. Sanders, who was a famous hand with young ones, landed Tad in the midst of that wonderful collection of animal stories with which Southern children have been familiar for many generations. The old Georgian told them so simply, and with such apparent confidence in their reality that the little son of the President accepted them as facts and was, for the time being, in another world—the world that had been created by the negro romancers who lived long ago.

Great statesmen passed and repassed them as they sat or lay reclining on the grass; Generals of the army, Congressmen, civilians, office-seekers, a curious and motley throng formed part of the procession, but, so far as Mr. Sanders and Tad were concerned, they were all phantoms, invisible to the eye.

Bethune and his aunt were soon on good terms again and they made their way slowly back to the White House, evidently thinking that Mr. Sanders had gone in. Presently a servant came out hunting for Tad.

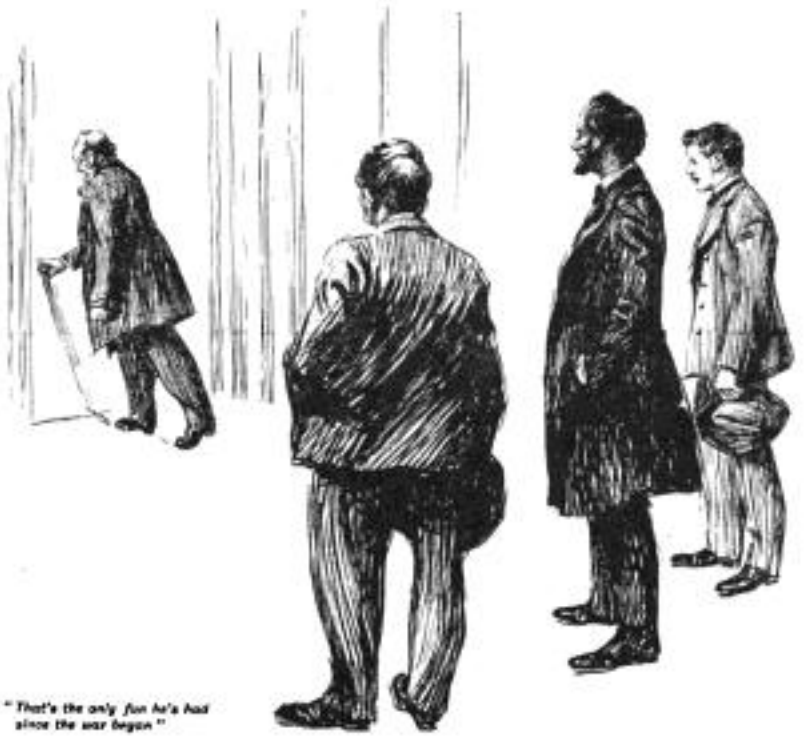
"We have been searching for you everywhere," the man said. "Your lunch is ready."

"Lunch!" cried Tad. He had been brought out of fableland so suddenly that he could hardly realize his surroundings. "Won't you come?" he said to Mr. Sanders with appealing eyes. "Please! oh, please come!"

"No; I reckon I better wait for you out here, or in the pen where they put the office-hunters," said Mr. Sanders.

"We have some extra fine soup, sir," remarked the servant by way of a suggestion.

When Mr. Sanders had been made perfectly sure that whatever pleased the child would be pleasing to his father and mother, he took Tad's hand, and together they went to the children's lunch-room. It is doubtful if Tad ever had another such day. The fun (for him) began when he made a somewhat riotous protest against a bib.



"Don't you wear 'em?" inquired Mr. Sanders in tones of surprise. "Well, I allers do." He turned to the waiter. "I wisht you'd pin one around my neck. I don't feel right wi'out 'em."

Then, with the napkin on, he made believe to be a little boy, and he carried out the pretense so solemnly that Tad fairly screamed with laughter. In fact, the youngster reached the point where he'd laugh almost to exhaustion every time Mr. Sanders looked at him. Mrs. Lincoln, hearing this unusual sound, left her guests for a moment and peeped in the door. For an instant she couldn't realize the situation. Mr. Sanders was saying, "What's your name?" and Tad was telling him. To which the reply was: "Well,

I'm named little Billy, an' I want some syrup in my plate so I can sop it." As Tad could say nothing for laughing, Mr. Sanders went on:

"One time I was eatin' a chicken gizzard an' I got to laughin', an' the fust thing anybody know'd the gizzard was stuck in my goozle. My mammy seed I was chokin' an' she hit me a lick on the back as hard as a mule can kick, an' the gizzard flew out an' knocked the cruet-stand off'n the table. This made me laugh, an' my mammy says, 'Sposin' you'd 'a' been gnawin' on the whole chicken, where'd you be now?' an' I says, 'Humph! you better ax where the chicken'd be.'"

"That's the only fun he's had since the war began"

This was too much for Tad. He slid out of his chair and fell on the floor, where he fairly screamed with laughter. The dignified waiter caught the contagion, somehow. He turned his back upon the rest and leaned half bent against the wall, trying to hold his sides with one arm. Mrs. Lincoln ran back to relate the episode to her guests and, in her efforts to tell of the scene she witnessed, her laughter became uncontrollable, and pretty soon she and her guests were in a state bordering on the hysterical—all except one, an elderly lady, the wife of a Cabinet Minister, who sat looking from one to the other with eyebrows lifted and a countenance expressive of contempt.

This lady seized upon this unpropitious moment to take her departure, and the gravity of her demeanor as she bowed herself out was such as to give new cause for laughter. The finishing touch was given when Mrs. Lincoln, who had a keen eye for the ridiculous, so far succeeded in controlling her countenance as to give a swift imitation of the solemn exit of the lady who had retired.

This last incident, as free from malice as an innocent caper of a schoolgirl, was duly reported to the Cabinet Minister's wife, and that lady made it her business from that time forth to spread abroad hints of Mrs. Lincoln's "flightiness," and out of these hints, so industriously planted, grew the thousand and one fictions that were scattered up and down the land in regard to the mental condition of this bright Lady of the White House.

That evening at dinner, after Bethune and Mr. Sanders had been introduced to Mr. Stanton and to Congressman Hudspeth, Mr. Lincoln referred to Tad's enjoyable luncheon, an enthusiastic account of which the lad had already given his father. Mr. Sanders made some humorous remarks on the subject of amusing children. For a time the talk was wholly between these two. Mr. Stanton seemed to be absorbed, though he watched the two Southerners very closely, while Hudspeth's thoughts appeared to be far afield. Finally, Mr. Sanders turned to Mr. Hudspeth and asked him if he had ever been in Georgia.

"Yes; I had some peculiar as well as some very pleasant experiences there."

"I allowed I'd met you there; you lived wi' Addison Abercrombie," remarked Mr. Sanders. "You needn't be ashamed of it," he went on, "for Mr. Seward was a school teacher down in that neighborhood years ago."

"Well, I wonder!" exclaimed Mr. Lincoln. "Stanton, the Governor has never told us about that. Well, well!"

"I mind him well," Mr. Sanders continued. "He was thin as a rail, wi' a big nose, an' his Adam's apple stuck out like a potleg. He had red hair an' a freckled face."

Mr. Hudspeth asked about little Crotchet, who was dead, and about Aaron, the Arab, in regard to whom Mr. Sanders volunteered the information that he now owned the Abercrombie place.

"What nonsense!" exclaimed Mr. Stanton, almost angrily.

"I mean, sir," exclaimed Mr. Sanders with a deprecatory gesture, "that Aaron is by the Abercrombie place like some folks I've seen are about the Government. He thinks he owns it an' he don't; they think they're runnin' the Government an' they ain't."

Mr. Stanton swelled up like a gobbler, as Mr. Sanders described it afterward, but Mr. Lincoln came to the rescue. Laughing heartily, he cried:

"A fair hit, friend Sanders! You've touched my weak point. I reckon I do put on too many airs."

Mr. Sanders had a remark ready, but he felt his foot pressed and he held his peace. At that moment Mr. Stanton addressed him.

"Who gave you a commission to come here?"

"A fellow named Doyle." It was Bethune who answered, and not Mr. Sanders. "Doyle gave me a pass from Mr. Lincoln. I regarded it as an invitation."

"And so it was," said Mr. Lincoln.

"Who invited you?" inquired the Secretary, turning his spectacles on Mr. Sanders.

"Well, I'm like the stranger at the infare. The folks saw him hangin' 'roun' the door, an' some on 'em axed him what he was doin' there, an' he said, says he, 'I heard the fiddlin' an' the shufflin', an' smelt the dram, an' I jest thought I'd look on an' see well done done well.'"

"Well, you may say that you had an invitation, too," remarked Mr. Lincoln. "I wouldn't have missed knowing you for a good deal."

"I can vouch for that," said Mr. Stanton ironically.

"If you can, Mr. Secretary, so much the better," Mr. Lincoln declared with some emphasis. "But these gentlemen are my guests. If they are to be catechized I'm the one to do it."

"But will you?" inquired the Secretary.

"No, I won't," replied the President.

"Why, Mr. President," cried Mr. Sanders, "he don't pester us one grain."

"Mr. President, I have just one more question to ask," said the Secretary.

"Fire away!" exclaimed Mr. Sanders.

"Did the man Doyle give you a dispatch to be delivered at the War Department?"

"He did," replied Bethune. "I suspected that it was a trap laid for us, opened it and had it deciphered. I kept a copy of the translation, and will now take occasion to present it to the President, so that he may see how the lives of human beings are trafficked in by those who desire to win Mr. Stanton's favor. We fell into the hands of a man named Awtry, but we insisted that he should bring us to the President."

He handed the copy of the dispatch to Mr. Lincoln, who read it, rubbing his chin thoughtfully. Then he turned to Bethune and regarded him with a half-humorous, half-melancholy, but wholly attractive smile.

"May I see this extraordinary dispatch, Mr. President?" asked the Secretary, holding out his hand for it.

"You have no objections?" the President nodded to Bethune.

"None in the world, Mr. President," was the calm and confident reply.

"Well, anyhow, I reckon I'd better put it in my pocket," said Mr. Lincoln in his slow, deliberate way. "It might worry you, Stanton, and it's a matter too trifling for you to be worried about. No, I'll take charge of it myself."

With that he folded the copy carefully and placed it in an old morocco pocketbook. He was absorbed in thought a moment or two, drumming on the table with his fingers. Then he lifted his head and laughed, remarking: "It reminds me of a story I heard——"

"Good-night, Mr. President! Good-night, Hudspeth!" exclaimed the Secretary sharply as he arose from the table. "You two," he said, indicating Bethune and Mr. Sanders, "will hear from me again."

"My post-office is Salem, Injianny," remarked Mr. Sanders in his matter-of-fact way.

This was too much for Mr. Lincoln, who laughed uproariously as Stanton stalked out. But he suddenly grew grave again. "I'm always forgetting my dignity," he declared. "Stanton is angry, and he has a right to be. But if he had seen this affair"—tapping his pocket—"he'd have half a regiment on guard here, and he'd keep it up until I went out and dismissed 'em, as a country showman dismisses his audience."

Congressman Hudspeth had a good many questions to ask about old acquaintances, and he and Mr. Sanders were soon engaged in a friendly discussion over the rights and the wrongs of the war. It was a discussion altogether useless, a fact to which the President called attention, with the result of putting an end to it. Shortly afterward Mr. Hudspeth, he being a prominent member of the military committee, excused himself and retired, and Bethune and Mr. Sanders soon followed his example.

"I'd ask you to sit up with me a while," said the President, "but I'll have a busy night of it. Come to-morrow night about ten. We must talk about your trip. Miss Brandon is very particular, and we must try to meet her views."

"You leave her to me, Mr. President," remarked Mr. Sanders suggestively.

"Gladly, gladly, my friend!" exclaimed Mr. Lincoln so heartily that Mr. Sanders was compelled to laugh, and even Bethune smiled.

Curiously enough, neither of the Southerners as they returned to their apartments spoke of the scheme which had originally brought them to Washington. Each was anxious that the other should make a suggestion to abandon it altogether, while each, for reasons that will be clear to every masculine mind, hesitated about making such a suggestion. Thus it was that neither mentioned the plan in any shape or form that night or the next day. It was a queer situation, and it was altogether characteristic that Bethune should worry over its embarrassments while Mr. Sanders was inwardly chuckling over its humorous features.

It was not until they were about to leave the hotel at the hour agreed upon that a word was said on the subject.

"I reckon you're feelin' a little nervous, Frank," suggested Mr. Sanders.

"Not more than you, I venture," replied Bethune calmly.

As Mr. Sanders had expected a somewhat different reply, he merely pursed his lips as though he were going to whistle, and said no more.

The carriage was at the door and Bethune and Mr. Sanders were driven swiftly to the White House. The two Southerners found Mr. Lincoln in high good humor. He welcomed them in the heartiest manner, slapping Mr. Sanders on the back and displaying in the most unaffected manner his delight at seeing his "two friends from Georgia," as he called them.

"You must have heard good news, Mr. President," suggested Bethune.

"Well, if I had I wouldn't tell you fellows; it would be bad news to you. But, as an old friend of mine used to say, 'No news is good news,' and when there's no fuss in the family, and no quarrel about a fence line, and the cow is giving down her milk, and the hens are laying, the man who forgets to be happy will miss a mighty good chance."

"That's so," assented Mr. Sanders.

"By the way," said Mr. Lincoln, turning to Bethune, "what put it into that man's head to charge you fellows with plotting to kidnap the President?"

"Doyle, you mean? Well, Mr. President, he could as easily have charged us with plotting to assassinate the President. I wonder he didn't, since all he had to do was to choose the word," replied Bethune.

"Well, when you two get back, what will you do to this man?" asked Mr. Lincoln.

"Why, we are in hopes his case will be attended to before we lay eyes on him again," was the answer.

"Is that so?" exclaimed Mr. Lincoln, sitting bolt upright. Then he laughed lightly, and leaned back again, throwing one of his long legs over the arm of his chair. "Well, don't be too hard on him."

The President, leaning back with his hands behind his head, gazed at the ceiling in silence for some time, apparently in a profound study. Then he laughed aloud at some amusing thought, and once more sat upright in his chair.

"Now, about this kidnaping business," he remarked. "Do you think it would be an easy matter to kidnap the President?"

Mr. Sanders gave a gasp of surprise as he turned in his seat.

"Mr. President," said Bethune, leaning forward and speaking in grave, measured accents, "Mr. President, it would be the easiest thing in the world."

"What time is it?" asked Mr. Lincoln.

"About half after ten," replied Mr. Sanders, consulting his silver watch, which was big as a biscuit and weighed about half a pound.

"Well, Stanton is to be here about half-past eleven, and he usually comes ahead of time. Now, what I want you to do," Mr. Lincoln went on with some eagerness, "is to show me how that kidnaping business could be carried out. Let's suppose a case, what we lawyers call a hypothetical case. Let's take it for granted that, in the performance of your duty, as you look at it, you had concluded that the easiest way to achieve what you call your independence is to seize the President and carry him South. Then let us suppose that matters had fallen out pretty much as they have. Here you are, two quick-witted Confederates; now show me how the kidnaping could be carried out."

"But, Mr. President," exclaimed Bethune, "that is precisely——"

Mr. Lincoln stopped him. "I know—I know!" he cried, and his voice overbore that of Bethune. "Know! what did he know? "I know how you feel about it; but this is purely a hypothetical case. I am supposed to be taken unawares."

Both Bethune and Mr. Sanders had arisen from their chairs, partly to conceal their excitement and partly to seize what seemed to be a providential opportunity. The event had, as it were, been taken out of their hands. They seemed to have no choice in the matter.

"Well, Mr. President, supposing that we had come here on such a mission," said Bethune, "it would probably be carried out in this way, making due allowances for emergencies." He went to the inner door and looked in. Then he went to the outer door and looked out into the wide entrance. The moment was propitious. He returned, stood by the President's chair, and then touched him sharply on the shoulder.

"Mr. Lincoln, great emergencies sometimes call for cruel remedies." Bethune's voice was grim in its earnestness. "We are two Confederates. You are our prisoner. Make no outcry. Not a hair of your head shall be harmed if you obey instructions. The situation is desperate for us, but it is more desperate for you."

SILENT SAM'EL

By Paul Laurence Dunbar

MISS ANGELINA BROWN was a young woman of many charms. Every one in Little Africa conceded that. No one who had seen her dash gracefully up the aisle of Mount Moriah Church to the collection-table with tossing head and rustling skirts; no one who had seen her move dreamily through the mazy dance at the hod-carriers' picnics could fail to admit this much. She was a tall, fine-looking girl, with a carriage that indicated that she knew her own worth, as she did.

What added to the glamour that hung about the name of the brown damsel was that she was the only daughter of a very solid citizen—a man who was known to have both "propity" and money. There was no disputing the solidity of the paternal Brown, as there was no question of his utter simplicity and unaffectedness. He had imparted to Angelina a deal of his own good sense, and though she did not flaunt it, she did not, like many others born hitherside the war, disdain the fact that her father had learned on his master's plantation the trade that supported them.

Under these circumstances it is easy to believe that the young woman had many suitors. There were many proper and stylish young men in the community who were willing to take the entrancing girl for herself in spite of the incubus of her riches. Indeed, there were frequent offers of such noble sacrifices; but Angelina was a shrewd high priestess, and she found it better to keep her victims in her train than to immolate them on the altar of matrimony. So it happened that there were few evenings when a light was not visible in the parlor of old Isaac Brown's house, and one or another of the young men of Little Africa did not sit there with Angelina.

It was of a piece with the usual good sense that governed this house that slow-going, unpretentious Samuel Spencer—"Silent Sam'el," they called him—made one of these evening sitters. Samuel was a steady-going, good-humored fellow, and a workman under the elder Brown. This may have accounted for Angelina's graciousness to him. For even when he was in her company he had never a word to say for himself, but sat, looked at the lamp, twirled his hat, and smiled. This was certainly not very entertaining for the girl, but then, her father had a high opinion of Samuel's ability. So she would make conversation, and endure his smiles, until old Isaac would call gruffly to him from the kitchen, and he would rise silently and go. Then Angelina was free to entertain whom she pleased for the rest of the evening, for the two men did not part until near midnight.

Once with his employer, Samuel would venture a remark now and then over the something like oily looking tea which they stirred round and round in their glasses. But usually he listened while the old man expounded his new plans and ideas, and every once in a while would shake his head in appreciation, or pat his knee in pure enjoyment. This happened every Wednesday, for that was Samuel's particular evening. Isaac Brown looked forward to it with more pleasure than Angelina. For as he said, when Samuel's silence was referred to, "You needn't say nothin' to me 'bout Sam'el Spencer. I reckon he talks enough fu' me; and 'sides dat, I's allus noticed dat hit took a might' sma't man to know how to keep his mouth shet. Hit's a heap easier to talk."

But there were others who were not so favorably disposed toward old man Brown's "pet," as they called him. Jim White, who was head waiter at the big hotel, and consequently widely conversant with men and things, said: "Huh, ol' Sam go down to ol' man Brown's, an' set up there fur an hour an' a half 'side Miss Angelina, her talkin' an' laughin' an' him lookin' like a bump on a log." And this same joke, though often repeated, never failed to elicit a shout of laughter from the waiters assembled about their leader, and anxious to laugh at anything the autocrat of the dining-room might condescend to say. Others went so far as to twit Samuel himself, but he bore all of this good-naturedly, and without attempting to change his manner, until one memorable night.

It was on the occasion of a great rallying festival at Mount Moriah Church, and a large part of Little Africa was gathered within the church walls, partaking of ice cream, oyster stews and coffee. As Angelina was one of those who had volunteered to help serve the company she had denied herself the pleasure of a "gentleman escort" and had gone early with her father and mother.

Jim White and Samuel Spencer were not the only ones who followed her about that evening with amorous glances. Young men bought oyster stews if she could serve them when they had eaten far beyond their normal capacities. Old men with just teeth enough left to ache gave themselves neuralgia with undesired ice cream.

Jim White had about him a crowd that he treated lavishly every time he could get Angelina's eye; and Samuel himself had already accomplished six oyster stews and was looking helplessly at his seventh.

There is no telling what might have happened had not the refreshments given out and the festival been forced to close. The young men and young women came together in twos and took their way home. But while Angelina stood counting her takings there were no less than six anxious beaus who stood waiting her pleasure.

Of these Sam was the nearest, and those who looked on were about to conclude that even slow as he was he would reach her this time first and gain permission to take her home, when just as a slight sinking of her head showed that her counting was done, Jim White stepped up and, with a bow, asked for "the pleasure." She looked around for a moment and her eye fell on her silent admirer. She hesitated, and then, turning, bowed to White.

The smile died on Sam's face, and he stood watching them blankly. Not until her escort had found her wraps and had put her in them and she had said a light good-night to those who waited did Sam awake from his stupor.

There were some titters as he passed out, and a few remarks such as, "Uh huh, Sam, you too slow fu' Jim. You got to move an' talk faster," or "You sholy was cut out dat time."

But he went on his way, though in spite of the smile that came back to his lips there was a determined look in his eyes. On the church steps he paused and looked after the retreating forms of Angelina and his rival, then with a short but not angry "Huh!" he went his way home.

There was in his mind the consciousness of something wrong, and that something was wrong, his far from dull wits told him, neither with Jim nor Angelina, but himself. He had a perfect right to speak to her first if he could, and she had a right to accept his company. He was bleakly just to every one concerned, and yet he knew by rights he should have taken Angelina home, and then the thought came to him that he could have said nothing to her even had he taken her home. Jim could talk; he couldn't. The knowledge of his own deficiencies overwhelmed him, and he went to bed that night in no happy frame of mind.

For a long while he did not sleep, but lay thinking about Angelina. It was nearly morning when he got suddenly out of bed and began dancing a breakdown in his bare feet, whispering to himself, "By gum, that's it!"

The landlady knocked on the wall to know what was the matter. He replied that he had been attacked with cramp in his feet, but was better now, and so subsided.

From now on a change took place in Samuel's manner of proceeding. The first thing that marked this change was his unexpected appearance in the Brown parlor on the next Monday. Angelina was entertaining another caller, but she received him pleasantly and, so far as an occasional reference to him would suffice, drew him into the conversation. However, he did not stay long, and so his hostess concluded that he had just been passing and had casually dropped in. What was her surprise when promptly at the same hour on the next night Samuel again came smiling in and settled himself to listen to the talk of that night's caller. Angelina was astounded. What did he mean? Had he begun to spy upon her and her company? Wednesday was his acknowledged night, and of course he had a right to come, but when he turned up on Thursday she openly tossed her head and treated him with marked coldness. The young man who had the pleasure of sitting out the hours on Thursday brought her a bunch of flowers. Samuel was evidently taking lessons, for on Friday night he appeared with a wondrous bouquet.

For one whole week, including Sunday, he was by the side of his divinity some part of every evening. The other young men were provoked. Angelina was annoyed, but less seriously than she might have been when she found that Samuel had the consideration never to stay long. The most joyful one of all concerned was old Isaac Brown himself.

"When Sam'el sets out a cou'tin' he does it jes' like he does evahthing else. Huh, de way he sot his cap fu' Angie is a caution."

But the truth of it was, Samuel Spencer was deeper than those who knew him could fathom. His week's visit to Angelina had not been without reason or result, and its object might have been discovered as he mumbled to himself on the last night of his constant attendance: "Well, I've heard 'em all talk, but I reckon that little Scott fellow that comes on Friday night's about the slickest of the lot. He'll have to do my talkin' fur me." He chuckled a little, and shook his head solemnly, "Ef somebody else got to speak fur me," he added, "I do' want nothin' but the best talent."

The next week it appeared that Samuel's sudden passion must have burned itself out as suddenly as it had appeared, for not even Wednesday night saw his face in the Brown parlor. Then was Angelina uneasy, for she thought she had offended him; and she didn't want to do that, for he was her father's friend anyway, even if he was nothing to her, and her father's—oh, well, her father's friend deserved respect. So she instructed the elder Brown to inquire the reason for the young man's sudden defection, and she was greatly soothed, even though she did not care for him, when her parent brought back the message that "Sam'el was all right, an' 'ud be 'roun'."

It was not until Friday night that he came and, contrary to his usual custom, he went directly back into the kitchen, where he spent the hours with the old man. Angelina was piqued, and she tossed her head as he came in just as Mr. Scott was leaving. He sat down and smiled at her for a little while, and then he said abruptly:

"I mean all he said."

She gazed at him in astonishment.

"I mean all he said," he repeated, and soon after bade her good-night.

Friday night after Friday night he came at one hour or another, and after Scott had poured out his heart to Angelina Samuel merely whispered in her ear that he meant all that. Now this was very shrewd of Samuel, for Mr. Scott was a very eloquent and fluent talker, and Angelina thought that if Samuel meant all the other said he must mean a good deal.

One night, with burning words, Scott asked the momentous question. Samuel was in the kitchen with Isaac Brown at the time his rival was making his impassioned plea. Angelina bade her wooer wait until she had time to think, and when he had gone she awaited the coming of Samuel.

He came in smiling, as usual.

"I mean all he said," he asserted.

"How do you know you do? You do' know what he said," retorted Angelina.

"I mean all he said," repeated Sam.

"La, Mr. Spencer, you are the beatenes' man! If you mean all he said why don't you say it yo'se'f?"

"I can't," said Sam simply.

"Well, Mr. Scott surely has said enough to-night."

"I mean all he said."

"I'm mighty 'fraid you'll want to back out when you hear it."

"I mean all he said," and Sam laid an emphasis on the "all." He was slowly working his way toward Angelina. His wits began to tell him what Scott had said.

"You ain't never ast me what he said."

"What?"

"Oh, I can't tell you; don't you know?"

By this time he had reached her and put his arm around her trim waist.

"I mean all he said."

"Well, then, I says yes to you fur what you means, even if you won't say it," and Angelina ducked her head on his breast.

Sam's eyes shone, and it was a good deal later before he left that night. As he stood at the gate he suddenly broke his silence and said, "I thought Scott was nevah goin' to git to the question."

He sat down and smiled at her for a little while, and then he said abruptly, "I mean all he said"

A Hindu Literary Woman

THE world grows smaller day by day and the old walls of linguistic and racial difference are crumbling away. The latest addition to English writers is a bright little Hindu woman whose lectures are well known in the United States. She comes of a high-caste family, and her name is S. Rajahgopaul. Her work is a compilation of the Hindu children's songs and her own metrical compositions.

Here and there is an odd resemblance between the ancient Indian songs and games and those of our own race. Where the Anglo-Saxon child refers to the dog, the cow and the bear, the Hindu child speaks of the tiger, the buffalo and the elephant.

The Gold Cure for Anti-Expansionists

NO INCIDENT of our war with Spain seemed stranger than that the first volunteer soldiers sent to the Philippines were drawn largely from the newest States of the Union—Utah, Montana, Idaho and Wyoming. They were as stalwart a lot of men as could have been found anywhere, and they gave a good account of themselves, but the change from the high altitudes and invigorating air of their homes to the swamps and torrid heat of the Philippines was great enough to startle the dullest imagination, as well as wear upon the strongest physique.

Yet some of them did not wish to come home when their term of service expired, and the reason has been dribbling slowly from soldiers' letters. Most residents of the States named are prospectors, either professional or amateur, for the precious metals; they cannot pass a ledge of rock without chipping it, nor can they cross a brook without lingering to examine its sands for "color." That they have been disappointed hundreds of times does not discourage them, for the future is the only time of which the prospector thinks, and even good luck in the past is as nothing to the fortune that is to come.

It was already known that gold existed in the Philippines, though the Spaniards had not succeeded in finding much of it. But our mining States' soldiers who did not return with their regiments, as well as many who went over with subsequent detachments of troops, kept their eyes and ears open, and between them, according to letters that have reached the United States, they learned where there is "placer" gold in paying quantities, as well as promising quartz veins, and at last accounts a few hundred discharged soldiers were impatiently awaiting permission to "rush" the country, stake claims and resume their home occupation, though they were ten thousand miles from home. Some who did not wait for permission, and had to be driven out by their late companions-in-arms, brought back a pleasing quantity of gold dust and nuggets to show to the doubting and envious.

It is unnecessary to say that if the new gold-fields "pan out" as well as reports indicate, and rich quartz veins are located, all home opposition to the retention of the islands will fall upon deaf ears. So will all talk about the inability of white men to live in the Philippines. Experience has proved abundantly that neither heat nor cold, distance nor hardship, difficulty of access nor inhospitality of natives has ever deterred Americans from seeking gold wherever it was known to be. Whatever our civil and military authorities may not know of the interior will soon be learned by the miners and by the prospectors, who always distance the miners and form the advance-guard of the movement toward new fields. Trade follows the miner as surely as it follows the flag; so does civilization—not at a bound, perhaps, but faster, at worst, than it makes its way in rude countries through any other influence. —JOHN HABBERTON.

War Mounted on the World's Stage

WAR is one of the fine old conservative occupations and, apart from planting cabbages and all for which planting cabbages may be allowed to stand, is certainly one of the best established and best recognized facts in existence. Mankind began to fight as soon as it began to exist and has gone on fighting ever since. This century has been as bloody as any in the world's history. And if the amount of fighting has been about the same the manner of it until recently has not been very different. Not, of course, that there have not been great actual changes, as, for example, when the burgher, harquebus in hand, proved himself more than a match for the mail-clad knight, and chivalry and privilege reeled in the saddle. But there has always been the same business character about it. Now, however, with the altered world of discovery and invention, a change undoubtedly has taken place in the way in which the average onlooker regards an important war.

In the first place, when it is only a few days to anywhere, the scene of conflict seems brought much closer. An American of the Napoleonic days, getting his news in months, could have only a very distant interest in what was going on, but it is assuredly different nowadays when every skirmish is served up "hot and hot," and when a battle is often reported almost step by step. The sending out of a small army of reporters to write and artists to illustrate exactly as is done for a great prize fight is a proof that war has become in a measure a sporting "event." What wonder is it, then, that with hourly dispatches and instantaneous photography war has come to assume something of the character of a spectacle! When one reads in the morning paper that some important post is being attacked, or that some desperate defense is being made, knowing that the story is to be "continued in our next," and that one may even have the dénouement in an "extra," an interest is created in which the critical pleasure of the reader is mingled with the thrills of the spectator.

This change may be said to have begun with the Franco-Prussian war, which was the first great spectacle mounted in this way on the world's stage. Since then each considerable war has become more and more scenic, more a spectacle at which the world "assists." It may almost be said that we enjoy our wars now.

Whether such a way of looking at what is a most unfortunate fact is something that makes for progress and civilization is not quite clear. At first there is a suggestion about the condition of affairs that recalls the Roman thousands thronging the amphitheatre and gazing enthralled upon the arena. For indeed it has come to this: that every battlefield is an arena on which the world looks down. However, there is unquestionably an advantage in the fact that since all is done under the eyes of the world there is more likelihood that the rules of the game will be observed; there is less chance of undue advantage being taken of a weaker foe, and more probability that an end will come quickly.

Oom Paul in New Jersey

AN ENTERPRISE of recent growth but apparently of unlimited possibilities is that of the moving picture as it manifests itself under various names in the theatre and other places of entertainment.

For some months it has been possible for a man to mingle with a crowd at a parade or something of this sort and go to the theatre in the evening and see himself walk across the screen with his fellow-victims. There has been a certain nervousness about this form of art, with an ominous sputtering of the machine up in the gallery, and a general impression in the mind of the beholder that something was going to happen; but on the whole the exhibition has usually been interesting.

The urban crowd and similar domestic scenes have for some time been accounted too prosaic by the moving-picture artist, and the recent wars have proved welcome material. There were shown to us Cuban conflicts, and now South African struggles. The idea of the heroic artist taking, so to say, his life in one hand and his camera in the other and going out on to the field of actual battle, and pressing the button three hundred times a minute amid the awful smoke and swirl of the conflict, has touched the popular imagination and drawn large crowds. Nor has the danger to the hardy picture-taker been wholly imaginary. He has known what it is to bleed and suffer for his art.

Take the battle of Spion Kop, for instance, one of the most desperate of the present war. The unfortunate wounding of the moving artist was responsible for the public becoming aware of the heroism of his kind. This frenzied struggle of Spion Kop took place among the fastnesses of the Orange Mountains, near Orange, New Jersey. But did the artist shrink from duty on this account? Far from it! Two hundred men had been engaged—many of them veterans of similar conflicts. Half were dressed in the uniforms of the Boers, half in that of the British. All the leading generals on both sides were on hand, and it is reported that Oom Paul himself was in the background, smoking a furious pipe. Some say that Queen Victoria was present, wearing her crown, but this is probably an exaggeration.

Just as the word was to be given to start the awful struggle a cannon was prematurely discharged. It was a heavy piece of ordnance, weighing, including the carriage, two hundred or two hundred and twenty-five pounds, and had done savage execution in the War of 1812 and at many noisy Fourth of July celebrations at Patterson and West Hoboken since. It was aimed pointblank at the artist. The wad struck him in the back and lifted him along some twenty feet. With remarkable self-possession Lord Roberts ran to the nearest district messenger box and sent in an ambulance call. The wounded artist was soon rattling over the kopjes to the Newark Homeopathic Hospital. Did he complain? Not he! His only regret was that the photograph apparatus was not going at the time, so that no picture of the scene was secured. Who shall say that this man was not a hero? But it is doubtful if either the British or the Transvaal Government will give him a pension.

This touching account of the battle of Spion Kop suggests many things. One of the most important is this: Why have we not in the moving picture a way to settle the question of the existence and habits of people on other planets? There is Mars—a few realistic domestic scenes of Martial life carefully worked up in the artistic atmosphere of New Jersey ought to prove interesting both to the ordinary citizen and to the astronomer. Men like the hero of Spion Kop are capable of arranging them. But cannons must be ruled out, or waddled with something soft and innocuous.

Our Uneasy Consciences

THERE is nothing more unreasonable than an overweening conscience. The sense of "ought," which an activity appeases; the sense of shame for one's "shortcomings," no matter how "long" we come in reality: this is an element in life which often tends to evil results.

Nagging is disagreeable and generally useless, whoever does it; and to have a perennial nagger incorporated in one's system is worse than an outside one.

There are two extreme results. One is a nervous, restless, ceaseless activity, without the accompanying rainbow in the soul that is supposed to accompany duty performed—it never is performed under such a conscience; the other is a callosity developed by the efforts of the organism toward self-preservation. The irritative conscience is encysted, wrapped up in smooth hardness, like the offending grain of sand in the oyster.

Neither of these conditions is healthful, nor promotive of wise, good conduct. Is it not possible to have it out with one's conscience, settle on a level of virtue one may consider attainable, and pursue the even tenor of one's way?

Here is a woman, a good deal of an invalid, fretting because she cannot write letters to deserving friends: feeling daily remorse at neglecting them. Now this is a simple matter to decide. She either can or cannot write a letter a day—or two—or three. If she can, there is no power that can prevent her. If she cannot, she is not to blame.

One can ascertain one's powers by a little careful experiment, live easily up to them, and experience a profound sense of piety and peace in the fulfillment.

Either one can or one cannot. How is one to know? By trying. Try hard, try nobly, test your outside limit; then walk easily within it.

We are not to blame for not doing what we cannot.

There is no great difficulty in doing what we can.

The best method of settling one's conscience is to drag it into the open, carefully define its demands, fulfill what is in one's power, and then refuse to be disturbed by any required impossibility. An undisciplined, exorbitant, irrational conscience is more distressful than a scolding mother and a teasing child. —CHARLOTTE PERKINS STETSON.

Man wants but little here below—and unless he owns stock in a trust he generally gets it.

Seeing Ourselves Through Cuban Spectacles

WHEN the poet exclaimed the desire to see ourselves as others see us he expressed a thought that is constantly in the human mind, but in reality it is something like confessing our sins—we would rather make excuses for them than publicly to acknowledge them.

All governments as well as all individuals who amount to much in the world make bold professions. From the budding youth who determines to go forth in the world and shoot Indians and tigers, and who proclaims his dauntlessness, to the great organization which annexes gold mines and wins States for benevolent reasons, there is a spirit of extravagant claim to doing the thing for the good of the Indians and the tigers and the gold mines. Nobody when going to war is going hunting ever admits selfishness or confesses anything but the highest motives.

Undoubtedly much of the noble language we used in the literary part of the war with Spain was right and well deserved. We were acting for the good of the world. There is no doubt about that. But the foolish people whom we took under our protection expected us to live up to our advertisements, and consequently when a marauding band of politicians from Ohio and Indiana got into the postal service of Cuba and stole a hundred thousand dollars or so the natives made invidious comments. And when in the face of absolute promises that Puerto Rico should have free trade we placed a tariff on all her products, the ungrateful beneficiaries of the new brand of freedom had the temerity to make complaints. So it goes. Even the Filipinos are saying that so far American occupation has been marked mainly by an inordinate increase in the imports of beer.

Of course these people will be educated up to things after a bit. If they are at all hopeless they have only to see how well we have civilized the American Indian.

Americans in Paris

THE famous art palaces of the Exposition, the Great and the Small, were thrown open May 1. Only a few thousand visitors were admitted to that section of the grounds. Outside of the gates of the Avenue des Champs-Élysées the police and cavalry kept back the mob.

"It's always that way," said a melancholy socialist; "we do the voting and the silk hats get the cake."

At two o'clock the President and Madame Loubet arrived, in a democratic barouche, without footmen or outriders. There were no cheers, for M. Loubet, in spite of the fact that he is a pleasant little man, has not the art of making himself popular with that class of the population that likes to shout in the streets. Physically the President of France is the exact counterpart of Mr. Andrew Carnegie; they are about the same age, and neither one is taller, thinner or grayer than the other.

Of the two thousand guests who received him at the doors of the Small Palace of Art, one-half were foreigners—artists or functionaries; they expressed their emotion by taking off their silk hats. M. Leygues, the Minister of Beaux-arts, and the Commissioner of the Exposition, M. Picard, are fairly long-legged men. They started off on a tour of inspection at a tremendous pace, the President trotting between them, while the guests swept after. Upstairs and down, through stone corridors and flowery courts, along endless galleries the procession passed, breathless. Always the President smiled and trotted and gasped "qu'il y a du bon!" Everywhere were pictures, sculptures, tapestries, ivories, jewels, furniture, precious objects of all sorts—a historical review of the art of France—brought from old châteaux and provincial museums. It took M. Loubet exactly twenty minutes to sweep through it all. Then the Grand Palace of Art——

The procession had grown a trifle; it was a hundred feet long and twenty feet wide. It flowed through the huge doors into a court, which the irreverent Parisians had already dubbed The Stables. Here it is the sculptors have stabled their horses. And what horses! They are twenty feet high; they are thirty feet high. They squat and rear and go curvetting up toward the blue sky. On D. J. French's horse is a marble Washington; on that of Saint-Gaudens poses General W. T. Sherman, led on by Victory; MacMonnies' horses stand ramping on their hind legs, while a Norwegian sculptor has reversed the idea, and his horses race head down into the earth, bearing "the dead who descend."

M. Loubet's Insatiable Appetite for Art

Through The Stables, up the grand staircase—up innumerable staircases—the crowd rushes, pursuing M. Loubet, who still trots and smiles. Here is the centennial of French art—all the masterpieces of a hundred years. (They are not all masterpieces now; time turns the old days to derision.) And here, at last, are the foreign sections, the United States having the best place of all, at the right of the grand staircase. It is admirably decorated. The hangings are all in pale green, while the frieze is ornamented with gilt laurel leaves and the national arms. It is a pretty harmony and in excellent taste. When Mr. John B. Cauldwell, director of the American Art Department, welcomes him, M. Loubet smiles and shakes hands and says something about "cordial fraternity—republican brotherhood," and hurries on through the five rooms of the American exhibit. He has made nearly six miles in one hour and a half. It is a record. As he spins away on his last half-lap all good Americans leave him. They look at the pictures. The triumph and sensation of the exhibit is Mr. Whistler's portrait of himself. It is a picture as delicate and profound as that masterpiece of modern portraiture, his portrait of his mother, which is now owned by the French Government, and hangs in the Luxembourg. A Harmony in Brown and Gold, Mr. Whistler calls his self-portraiture. And yet it is not only himself he has painted; he has painted what is perhaps the best type of the artist. There is distinction in the face—something at once mysterious and aristocratic and, if I am not mistaken, ironic. You can see there is not only the great artist who paints, but as well the man who sees in life only a subject to be painted. And this surely is James McNeill Whistler. His work is sincere for the very reason that it is not complicated with theories. The "eccentricities" of which every one talks have no place in his art.

As we said these things and others far more enthusiastic there passed a slight, little man, dressed all in black. His hands and feet were small as those of a child, and he wore a huge silk hat of the fashion of thirty years ago. His face was the color of parchment, and mustache and imperial were grizzled, and a mass of fluffy grayish hair stood out around his head like a halo.

He walked slowly, staring through his eye-glass.

We took off our hats—for this was Whistler in the flesh—a "living old master," as The Saturday Evening Post aptly called him once upon a time.

Abbey's Hamlet, Sargent's portraits of a woman in rose and of the President of Bryn Mawr College, a portrait by Chase of a woman in a white shawl, Alexander's Rodin, and Julius L. Stewart's delicious composition, The Nymphs of Nysa, are pictures that appeal to one even in the bustle of an "inauguration" day. The exhibit is good and strong. In this competition the United States has nothing to fear. The general characteristic of all these paintings seems to be extraordinary ability—that is, a mastery of the painter's craft. It is the American characteristic of doing things well. There is little sentimentality and little of what one might call profound thoughtfulness. It is the art work of a nation vigorous, accomplished and little given to brooding; and this is just what it should be.

"The Best Bear Story in the World!"

Alexander P. Proctor came out of Colorado. He had a ranch out there ten years ago and he sold it and went to New York and studied art. By the time the Chicago World's Fair came along he had some reputation. You may remember his polar bears, and especially his jaguars. So he got married and came to Paris for his honeymoon——

"The visit and the honeymoon have lasted seven years," he says, "but I'm going back to my cottage up the Hudson after the Exposition."

Of all the American sculptors, I think Mr. Proctor deserves most of America. Mr. Proctor is essentially and racially American. His sculptures all speak of that great West from which he came; they are Indians, elk, panthers, broncos—they are the West. And this racial interpretation is, after all, the only vital form of art. There is nothing like modeling in the clay of your own back yard.

I have no intention of talking art—I merely started to tell you the Best Bear Story in the World, and as Mr. Proctor figures in it, you had to know him first. It came about this way: The other day I saw this dignified sculptor in his garden in Auteuil making exciting casts with a thirty-six-foot lasso, while his three-year-old girl, Hester, looked on in amazement.

"What's the matter?" I asked.

"Son and heir," he shouted, lassoing a lilac bush; "he came last night, and I had to get out the old lasso to celebrate. It's the happiest day in my life—except the day I killed my first bear."

And this is how it happened:

The Bear Still Coming

"When I was sixteen years old I was at Grand Lake, Colorado, some hundred miles or more from Denver. The family were on their usual summer vacation, you understand, and I and my brother George were along. George had a new Sharp's forty-calibre rifle, so he swapped me his old gun for a hunting-knife that cost me seventy-five cents. Late in September there was a fine tracking-snow, and I determined to go out for a day's elk hunt. I wanted to go with George and an old hunter named All-Horse Johnson, but they refused me and Old Roary, as they called my gun. It wasn't much of a gun, I admit. In the beginning of its career it had been an army musket, but it had been born again and come out a fifty-calibre needle gun. It was cranky at times, refusing to explode the cartridge or to eject the empty shells, but it had a full-grown two-mule kick that it used on all occasions.

"Well, this September morning as I said, there was a fine tracking-snow. My brother and All-Horse got off at four o'clock, leaving me behind. By the time I started it was nine o'clock. About eleven o'clock I ran into a bunch of nine elks. There was one good bull, but he was on the other side of the gulch. I stalked him through the bushes and down timber to within one hundred yards. Just as I was getting ready to fire, one of the cows, some thirty yards away, saw me and gave the alarm. As the bunch started off, I took a running shot at the bull and wounded him. All the elk ran a short distance and stopped. I sent one shot after them, but nothing happened. Then I followed the trail of the wounded bull until late in the afternoon, when I found where he had lain down quite frequently. I ran down from my elevation into the little thicket, thinking he had gone on—and came almost plump upon him. He dashed for me and I blazed away without taking the gun to my shoulder. As I jumped aside he struck at me with his horns. In a moment he was after me again, but clumsily, for his left hind leg was broken. It was hard work dodging the elk and trying to load at the same time, but at last I got a cartridge in and placed a shot that broke his neck."

The Arrival of the Bear

Up to this point Hester and I had not believed there was a bear in the story at all; but there was.

The bear was coming up the gulch leisurely, through the shallows and grass. The bear had seen the boy and the boy hesitated. Perhaps Old Roary would fail to explode the cartridge; perhaps—but remembering that ever since he could toddle he had been looking for a bear, the boy blazed away.

Now, old Len Pollard had told the boy that the only time to fire at a bear is when he is looking away and can't tell where the shot comes from. The boy did his best, but before he got the sight and pulled the trigger, he saw the bear looking straight at him. That shot went through the ribs and liver, but it didn't stop the bear; he came on at a sort of lumbering gallop. Old Roary refused to be loaded again, and the boy said to himself: "If I don't get out of here pretty quick, the folks at camp will never hear about that elk." He started to his feet, and as he did so the bear pitched forward on his nose, and fell. He was dead—dead as the elk.

The boy forgot his bruises and kissed Old Roary and danced with him in the twilight. Then he dressed the bear and struck out for camp, four miles away. And what the boy said when he got there and what All-Horse said and what George said, you may imagine for yourself.

When Mr. Proctor finished this story we went in and looked at the skin of the bear and the horns of the elk—upstairs the son and heir yelled fiercely.

"That boy's dreaming of Colorado already," said the sculptor proudly.

LETTERS to the EDITOR

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

Calling on my aunt, Mrs. Grundy, to-day, I found her considerably exercised over the editorial on Fairy Stories in THE SATURDAY EVENING POST.

She says that she does not object to Mother Goose, or to Hawthorne's fairy tales retold, or to Kipling, or even to Rudyard's stories for children, though here I noticed she paused a minute.

She dotes on Andersen and fairly chuckles over Grimm's stories, unexpurgated, though she would not urge children to read the latter, and would never read or tell them to them. She only looks mildly bored when the children singsong Hiawatha, and she shook with glee when one school class read in concert, with close attention to the blackboard illustration:

"At the evening, by his tent door,
Sat the little muddy turtle."

She wants the children to have plenty of pure sugar, especially with their oatmeal. But she would not feed them entirely on nectar, and not at all on cheap, dirty, colored candy; and she objects to the feeble, unwholesome, imitation literature (?) that children have been overwhelmed with. She admires Palmer Cox, but is weary of the long train that tags after him.

Fairy tales by people of genius she holds precious, but she says that the children's papers are not crowded by the mark of Genius.

"Let genuises," she says, "write poems and fairy tales, but let commonplace writers give us a rest from twaddle."

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

Say five years ago a corporation was organized. A year later the company finds that after paying expenses, interest and reasonable dividends on paid-up stock, there is still a fund on hand of $90,000 = net profit. The general manager shows the board that this was one of the years when "America has been wearing her old clothes"; that following years promise even better returns; that six cents is reasonable interest on one dollar; that prosperity always follows depression; that $90,000 pays six per cent. interest on $1,500,000; that our plant has increased in real, productive value in the sum of $1,500,000, and should be capitalized to that additional amount. This is duly effected, a dividend of six per cent. declared on this new issue, the books correctly balanced, and the company tells the world of its prosperity, and necessary increase of capital to meet a growing trade.

Here we have a model corporation, but the $1,500,000, which cost nothing, is not all. This capitalization, productive, paying six per cent. dividend in depressed times and promising more in better times, forms a selling and perhaps legal basis for a bond issue of another million dollars, and allows an increase of the business without the investment of a dollar. In fact, they receive $90,000 in cash for taking the $1,500,000 in stock and the $1,000,000 in bonds. With many companies doing this for years, it is no wonder capital has passed into the hands of the few.

New promoters can usually arrange to have sufficient capital stock issued to avoid any troublesome question of method of increase. They can protect the real investor by preferred stock and can usually make the protection ample. Then they can make an outlet for surplus earnings in common stock, but the same principle governs. Every six cents of net earnings shall be a dollar in their hands.

Now the public is inquiring if this method is just, if this stock should be of the value of money. They do not see any individual manipulating funds in this way. The laborer thinks his influence in producing that $90,000 was very direct, and not very liberally paid, and perhaps that this $1,500,000 of stock dollars, if it is dollars, should be his, and then he could have a factory or mine or store and bond it for $1,000,000, and do business. He says the capital drew its dividend, the officers good salaries, the bondholders their interest, and only his own wage was small, yet that it is so arranged now that he must continue to earn this annuity for all time, and that the grasping of this dollar by the stockholder is an unjust and oppressive scheme.

But the masses of the people, not being in direct contact with the plant like the laborer, are beginning to see the influence of these stock dollars, and to learn their source, and to think their base is taken from them in unnecessary profits. They argue much the same, that the capital, dividend, interest, salaries and wages are fully paid, and that they have furnished the net profits out of which this dollar in stock is maintained; that it is in the hands of moneyed men who will make its interest or dividend a perpetual annuity that the public must pay.

Besides this kind of capitalization, the public has furnished the main contributions for many plants; bonds have completed the expenditures; and the public pays dividends on the stock which cost nothing.

If the $1,500,000 stock mentioned above and all like profits are to be maintained as dollars in value, then every employee in proportion to his effectiveness should be a recipient of his share with the capitalist.

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

If education is a developing of the possibilities which exist in the individual, considered in his threefold nature, physical, mental and moral, discontent, as a result, is inconceivable. But if one of the departments of his nature is educated to the exclusion, or even neglect, of the others, or if two of these are developed and the remaining one uneducated, the result may easily be conceived to be discontent. Unbalanced, there cannot be harmony, consequently there must result restlessness and discontent. Whether our system of education is producing this harmony of development is a most serious and interesting question.

If it is a fact that our schools are turning out, as a result of their training, a generation of restless and discontented young men and young women, it is high time to probe our system for the cause.

Uncle Podhardy's Foot Race

By Hayden Carruth

—"Git 'em, Midget!" yells Polkberry, and away they went

I WAS frequently told that Mr. Milo Bush had, hidden away in the recesses of his mind, a story about an alleged aged athlete who at a former period was said to have infested the town, and was assured that it was worth my while to draw it from him. This I doubted, not being able to see the positive benefit which I had derived from any of his other tales. Indeed, I had come to look upon him as a man careless of the truth, though it was impossible to doubt that he did not himself fully believe all his stories. If he did not believe them he was a most marvelous actor, for he told them in a frank, simple manner and always as if the hearer were being in some way benefited rather than entertained by the recital. And the thought that the listener might doubt any statement of his never seemed to enter his mind.

So, after hearing from several sources of the ancient gymnast, I decided to face him through Mr. Bush. But this biographer seemed to have forgotten about him; at least, several references on my part to the grandfather in outdoor sports brought no response. This nettled me a little and I decided on a bolder course. One day, when he dropped in to proffer some advice concerning the training of pointer pups (I was not a pointer pup owner and stood in no need of advice on that head), I picked up a newspaper clipping and pasted it on a sheet of copy paper, at the same time observing carelessly that it was an interesting account of how a Connecticut man, eighty-three years old, had walked ten miles on a wager, and that I purposed printing it in my paper. Mr. Bush instantly dropped the vital question of pointer pups, hitched his chair closer and said:

"How old did you say the party might be?"

"Eighty-three."

He snorted once or twice and then said: "Well, a man at eighty-three ain't any boy, now, is he? He ain't wot you'd call an infant in arms, eh? He's cut his teeth, prob'bly—the heft of 'em, at least. But I don't see why he should make any great fuss about walking ten miles. A man at that age ain't gener'ly very busy—lots of spare time—don't see why he shouldn't walk. That's wot he's for. Ought to be a law compelling any man who has passed his eighty-third birthday to just get right out on the road and travel. But the idee of bragging about it!"

He paused and for the space of a minute was lost in reflection, then he continued: "Yes, I can't see why a man only eighty-three should crow about walking ten miles to the post-office, or anywhere else. If he'd hopped it, for instance, on one leg, then he might talk. I never heard of a man eighty-three bopping ten miles on one leg, nor never seen anybody that ever said they had. Don't believe any man eighty-three ever did hop that distance on one leg—not at one time, anyhow. Consider'ble hop, I should say. Likely to rattle his teeth loose, if he had any. Don't believe old Uncle Podhardy ever done it. Now, there was a man—say, I'll just tell you about Podhardy, then you'll never need to get took in again with stories about any old gent doing things.

"Old Uncle Podhardy. Lived here in an early day. Had a grandson—Jeff Podhardy. Jeff's third wife was Samantha Bugle, widder of old Pete Bugle, who had a pension and never was satisfied with the diseases he had, but was always on the lookout for fresh ones. If you was a doctor and thought up a new disease you could just go right to old Bugle about it and if he didn't have it, he'd get it. Just tell him the symptoms and he'd have the disease good and hard inside of a week. Made a specialty of constitoutional diseases—got insulted if the Doc told him he had an organic disease—said he'd had all them organic diseases 'fore he was ten years old. Says the Doc to him one day in the drug store: 'Old man, wot you've got is prevaricatis.' 'Wot's that?' says Pete. 'Well,' says Doc, 'it's a sort of a mental disease. Shows itself in the talk of the patient mostly. First case on record was Ananias. Ananias had it bad—it finally killed him.' 'Pshaw,' says Pete, 'I was born with it. I've doctored for it for thirty years.' 'Well, you ain't cured yet,' says the Doc; 'you've got it chronic.'

"But old Uncle Podhardy never seemed to take to diseases a-tall—they didn't fetch Pete; he finally slipped up on the ice and come down on his back kerflop and broke his spiral colyum—Uncle Podhardy just went to the other extreme and was always bragging 'bout his blame good health. Said he used to be ailing some till he got to be about eighty, when he sort o' braced up and give his spectacles to a tramp and sent his cane to the furren mission society for the heathen in distant lands, which he heard was going 'round scand'lous, without anything they ought to have.

"The only time Uncle Podhardy was ever under the weather after that was when some of Jeff's girls got it into their heads that he was hurting himself smoking and hid his pipe, and got him a box of anti-nicotine cigars. It was a sad sight to see the old gent setting on the stoop pumping away at them patent cigars, finishing one every ten minutes and reaching for another and raising smoke enough for a brick kiln. But he couldn't get no satisfaction out of 'em, and finally he just laid down on the floor and turned up his toes and wiggled 'em a little—just sort o' fluttered 'em, like that—it would 'a' made you cry to see him—and they sent for the Doc and he come and give him a hypodemocratic injection of about two teaspoonfuls of pure nicotine—b'iled-down nicotine—and that sort o' revived him and the girls brought back his pipe, kind o' sniffling and saying, 'Poor old grandpop—here's your dear old pipe,' and he sot up and took it and waved his hand like a play-actor and says he: 'Remove them pestilences hence!' meaning the patent cigars—he was all excited and sort o' talked poetry—and they took 'em away, and the next day the girls unrolled 'em and dyed 'em and used 'em to trim their spring hats; and after that old Uncle Pod never let his pipe out of his mouth—just anchored it right there—and kept getting stronger and his health O. K.-er the longer he lived.

"Well, all his life Uncle Podhardy had been a great hand for sport. Amateur sport, that is—no perfessionalism for the old man. 'Wot's the great hope of this country?' he used to say. 'Wot is it that we must depend on to keep us from becoming like them European dinnasties? Our strong, athletic young men, I say. Them must ever stand a mighty bull-work against national decay.' Always ready to tell you just who it was made the highest jump and the streakenest run in any particular year. Could rattle off the winner in the Yale and Harvard foot race for every year since it started. If you wanted to know which college used the London Prize Ring rules and which the Marquis of Queensberry he could tell you, and why, and which was best for a stoodent.

"But Podhardy was always down on perfessional sport. 'This thing of making a business of developing the body and building up the system is all wrong,' he used to say. 'Give me the clean, honest amateur who is in sport for the love of it. A chance at the purse and the opportunity to place a few side bets ought to satisfy any man—let him leave the gate receipts to them base souls that care for sich.' Economical citizen, the old man was, too—always saved the pertater the grocery man stuck on the spout of his coal-ile can. Used to buy half a can at a time so's to get more pertaters.

"But a thing that worried Podhardy a good deal was that men didn't keep up their exercising and athleticing when they got older. 'Here's a young man works hard and conscientiously in college,' he used to say, 'and gets so he can throw a hammer a mile and a half, and then when he gets out, wot do we see? He stops it all and keeps getting fatter and fatter, till finally from a slender, athletic man he develops into a critter it takes five minutes to walk around. Then next thing he knows he keels over with fatty denomination of the heart. How often do you see a man of sixty up on a trapeze hanging by his toes? Alars, too seldom!'

"But the old gent kept up his own exercising. You could see him 'most every morning 'fore breakfast hustling down to the grocery store, his head up and his shoulders throwed back and his coal-ile can in his hand. Then he'd come downtown after supper and challenge the young fellers to a broad jump, or a fifty-yard dash, or pitching quates, or something. Many a time he'd beat 'em, too. Used to be very fond of jumping up and cracking his heels together—you know how hard it is to hop up and crack your heels twice before you come down. Well, there's no telling how many times he could crack his heels, but it was a good many. Crack, crack, crack, it went, just like that, like a boy drawing a lath along on a picket fence. Strong on the running jump, too, and on handsprings, though he quit them mostly after his sickness, 'cause they was apt to make him lose his hold on his pipe, and he never knowed when them girls might be lurking 'round to catch it on the fly and put him on patent cigars again.

"Just before the old man was ninety he hatched up a scheme to mark the event. So, on his birthday he put a challenge in the papers to run a foot race with any other man in the country of his age for $500 a side, quarter-mile dash. It got copied all over and he soon begun to get replies. You'd be surprised to know how many old parties there was that wanted to run, or thought they did. But they was the crankiest lot—all making conditions of some sort. One feller in Michigan wanted ten rods start 'cause he was ninety-four; but Podhardy wrote him that he wouldn't give him one rod the start if he was a hundred and twenty. Then a party in Tennessee said he'd run if the stakes could be made $50,000; but Podhardy wouldn't listen to him. Next an aged citizen of California proposed a start of fifteen rods 'cause he didn't have but one leg, having lost the mate to it in the War of 1812; but Podhardy wrote him a stinging letter and told him he couldn't have an inch the start, not if he'd lost both legs in the Revolution.

"Then a feller in Wisconsin said he'd race if Podhardy would throw off two years, he being only eighty-eight; but Podhardy told him he might arrange a race later on with boys, but that this was strictly a go between men. Next a Pennsylvania man wanted to put up only $100 against Podhardy's $500 'cause he had rheumatiz and asthma; but Podhardy wrote him that this was a foot race and not a field hospital. Then a Georgia man said he'd do it if Podhardy would agree to their both running backward, the backward sprint being his strong holt; but Podhardy told him that this was a race, not a game of lawn-tennis, and he never heard nothing more from the Georgia Reversible.

"Well, it begun to look as if Podhardy wasn't going to get any race a-tall. It run on for three or four months, with fellers finding fault and proposing this and that, when he got a letter from a man in Arkansawr saying he was just ninety and the stakes was all right and the distance sooted him, and everything was lovely and the goose hung high, which tickled Podhardy, 'cause he hadn't heard that observation for forty or fifty years. So he wrote to him and told him to come on and hurrah for Andrew Jackson or Tippecanoe, whichever his politics was.

"Then the feller wrote back and said there was one little condition, after all, though it wa'n't hardly worth mentioning, but he thought everything ought to be fair and square, and no shenanigan, as Aaron Burr used to say; and this was, that owing to defective vision, he always was in the habit of running with his little dorg Midget to lead him and keep him on the track. Hoping this finds you in your 'customed health, I have the honor to subscribe mysell, your obegent servant, the goose being still high, Jabez Washington Polkberry.

"Well, Podhardy was pretty mad and wrote and told him that it was a foot race and not a dorg chase. But the feller wrote back a sort of begging letter, saying it had been the custom since the year one for blind men to be led by little dorgs, and he thought it was pretty hard that he couldn't have no show because he'd been patriotic and got out and fit and helped lick them British and Hezzians and bloody Injuns and got his sight damaged. Podhardy needn't be afraid of Midget, 'cause he was gentle and wouldn't hurt a flea, which could be proved, he always having some sound ones on him; and besides, he'd agree to double muzzle the dorg and pay ten dollars if he bit. And then he was Uncle Pod's obegent servant again, with the goose higher than ever.

"Well, this was too much for Podhardy and he give in, and they fixed up the articles of agreement. Polkberry wrote in the section about the dorg:

> "'Whereas, the party of the second part, being defective of vision from handling them British, our naitteral enemies, rough at Landy's Lane, New Orleans, Washington and wherever they showed their Hydray heads dooring the late war, therefore be it resolved, and it hereby is resolved, and made a part of this indenture and instrument, namely, to wit: That he be allowed to be led by his dorg Midget, the said party of the second part being attached to the said dorg Midget by a string, cord, twine or other ligiment; and it being further covenanted and agreed that the said dorg Midget shall be double muzzled to protect the legs of the party of the first part, and his nails clipped.'

"Well, the articles of agreement was signed and the stakes deposited with Judge Peters, of the Orphans' Court, neither of the parties, it appeared on careful investigation, having parents living; and the Judge also agreeing to hold Pod's pipe and watch out for the girls, so everything was ready. The race had been sot for county fair day, and Podhardy went into training and got out on the track every morning and practiced, leaving his ile can behind the fence. Of course we didn't know anything about the other's running, but Podhardy making it every morning a second or two better, and we also being in favor of encouraging home industries, we all got ready to bet on him.

"Polkberry hadn't appeared up to twenty minutes before the time for the race to be called and Podhardy was getting pretty nervous, not wanting to take the race by default. But five minutes later we seen a little old dried-up party wearing big bloo goggles toddling along from the deepot, hold of the arm of a big young feller wearing spurs and a belt with a gun in it which looked as if it had been used at the battle of New Orleans and had been growing ever since. Biggest feller and heftiest personal weepin I ever seen. There was a little wad of a dorg tagging along behind and the old gent carried a cane and kept swinging it around; and the feller had a covered basket on his arm big as a bale of hay.

"We seen who it must be, and I, as chairman of the Reception Committee, went up to him and says I: 'Old man, do I have the honor to address Jabez Washington Polkberry, Esquire?' 'You do, me boy, you do,' squeaks the old gent; 'but, alars! I cannot behold your face, owing to my defective vision, got on them tremenjous battlefields.' 'And who might this party with the artillery be?' says I. 'Lemmy interjuce him—my little great-grandson Frankie,' says he. 'Howdy, Frankie,' says I, reaching up and shaking a hand like a sugar-cured ham; 'wot might you have in the crate, Frankie—cotton bale?' 'Just my baggage,' pipes the old man, 'just my track fixings—blankets, shoes, toe-weights and such truck. Show us the way to the track, me boy—I must uphold the credit of old Arkansawr.' And about this time we noticed several strangers on the grounds wearing boot-leg mostly, though they had on some gun; and they was all anxious to bet on Polkberry and we 'commodated 'em, it being plain as a pikestaff that he wa'n't in Podhardy's class a-tall as a runner.

"'Well, when we'd bet all the money we had we led Polkberry over to the track and he give his cane to the Judge and changed his shoes and took a pull out of a black bottle. Then Podhardy come out and I interjuced 'em. They shook hands, and says the stranger: 'He, he, me boy; glad to meet you at last. I can tell from your grip that you've got the right stuff in you. All ready, me boy! Toe the scratch! Keep off the track! Pity the poor, old, blind man!' And Frankie opened the other side of the basket and the old scoundrel grabbed a piece of rope, and a dog as big as a yearling calf jumped out and come down so he shook the track, his stub tail standing straight up and two muzzles on him made out of bird cages.

"'Wot—wot is that?' yelled Podhardy.

"'That—that is my dorg Midget,' says Polkberry.

"'But I thought he was a little dorg!'

"'Them articles don't say nothing about his size. That's my dorg Midget. Get out of the way! Pity the blind man!'

"'But where's that little dorg I seen with you?'

"'Don't know nothing 'bout him. I ain't responsible for stray dorgs that take a notion to foller me.'

"'Fraud! Fraud!' yells Podhardy.

"'That's my dorg Midget that I'm to run with,' says Polkberry, calm. 'Is it not so nomernated in the bond?'

"Well, you peg-diggled old hippopotamus!' says Podhardy, unable to articulate more.

"'This is no fit time for personalities,' says Polkberry. 'Clear the track! All ready, Midget!' And all the time little Frankie leaning on the basket, careless like, his hand sort of caressing the butt end of that ordnance.

"'All right—I'll run the old scoundrel!' says Podhardy.

"'Pity the blind man—sic 'em, Midget!' yells Polkberry, and away they went, Podhardy making more gravel fly than he ever made before in his life. But, jimminy-joe! he didn't make enough fly, not by ten tons. That there blame' dorg just put down his head and doubled up and straightened out, and doubled up and straightened out, and that confounded old skeesicks just froze to the rope and touched his toes along on the ground once in a while, merely to steady himself in the air; and poor little Frankie legging it behind, carrying that cannon in one hand and the articles of agreement in the other.

"Of course there was nothing for Judge Peters to do but pass the money over to Polkberry, and he counted it, careful, and kicked on one bill 'cause it was counterfeit and got a good one in place of it. And then them two jayhawkers walked away, the old gent carrying his cane over his shoulder, and Frankie toting his gun up under his chin, and Midget with his tail p'inted a little forward of straight up. And after we had paid our bets them strangers wandered off, too; and then we happened to think of Podhardy. We looked around and found him lying on his back on the ground, his toes just fluttering feebly.

"'Old man,' says I, 'it is done.'

"He still had strength to answer. 'Thou speakest trooth,' says he; 'so am I. Did the Arkansawyer take also my pipe? Was it so nomernated in the bond?'

"We seen that the shock had temporarily upset his mind, so we give him his pipe and carried him to his home."

Chestnut Culture

By René Bache

THE growing of chestnuts for market is the newest agricultural industry, and promises to be a source of great profit to the growers who have been far-seeing enough to go into it. Hitherto the chestnut has been regarded in this country as a wild crop, and the notion of improving it by grafting and reducing it to domestication, as it were, is as yet a novelty. Already, however, the cultivated chestnuts are being offered for sale in considerable quantities, and there is a steady demand for them on account of their larger size, and at high prices. Thus the business of producing them has been stimulated, and a good many large groves of grafted trees are now to be found in Pennsylvania and other Eastern States, as well as in California. The soil of Pennsylvania seems to be specially well adapted for this purpose.

There never has been any question of the fact that the Yankee chestnut is by far the finest in the world, none of the foreign varieties comparing with it in point of flavor. But the latter have a great advantage in respect to size, and for that reason efforts have been made during the last few years to graft the big French marron and the still larger Japanese chestnut upon American stocks. The Japanese chestnut is the largest in the world, being nearly twice as big as the marron. It was introduced into the United States about 1876, and the variety is propagated readily here by planting the nuts. The tree bears early and grafts readily.

Experiments in cross-grafting with the marron have been very satisfactory. This variety, which is largely grown in Spain, Italy and Portugal, as well as in France, was introduced originally from Asia Minor into Europe by way of Greece. It is as large as a fair-sized horse-chestnut, but decidedly inferior in flavor to the American chestnut. It grows well in this country, and many orchards of marrons are now to be found in the central States along the Atlantic and as far west as the Mississippi River. In fact, the marron will soon become fairly plentiful as a native crop. It is not new in this country, having been produced on this side of the water early in the present century.

As yet, of course, the quantity of cultivated chestnuts brought to market is relatively small and they are bought up with such avidity, as one might say, that one rarely sees any of them. However, it is not the marrons or the Japanese nuts that are wanted, but American chestnuts of superior size, whether produced by cross-grafting or otherwise. Wonderful things have been accomplished by cross-fertilizing the marron and native chestnut, using the pollen of one to impregnate the blossoms of the other. At a recent show of the National Pomological Association in Washington nothing excited so much attention as a plate containing four huge open burrs, in each of which were four gigantic chestnuts. These nuts were a cross between the American and the marron. It is coming to be realized that there is as sure a profit in a chestnut grove as in an orchard of apples or pears, and the time will soon arrive when the wild nuts will cut a very small figure in the market. When it is understood that a single tree in full bearing will yield a profit of forty to fifty dollars a year under favorable circumstances, intelligent growers will go into the business.

Along a narrow belt in this country, in Georgia, North Carolina, Tennessee, Pennsylvania and the mountains of Virginia, are found wild chestnuts nearly as big as the marron. They are, in fact, as large as small horse-chestnuts, and the reason why one never sees them in the market is obvious, the supply being very limited. Some of them measure as much as an inch and a half in diameter and their flavor is exquisite. Grafts from the trees produce admirable results, and it has been strongly recommended by the Department of Agriculture that they be utilized. On the other hand, we have a dwarf chestnut called the chinkapin, which is more or less abundant on sandy knolls and hillsides along the Atlantic seaboard from Delaware to Northern Florida and westward across Pennsylvania to eastern Texas. It is small, but very sweet and delicious, and experiments in grafting the European and Japanese varieties upon it have been most successful. Some chinkapins, indeed, are as big as good-sized chestnuts.

In France, where chestnuts are widely grown, they have come to play an important part in the dietaries of the poor. A common way of preparing them is to remove the shells and steam them, when they may be eaten with salt or milk, furnishing a cheap and nutritious food.

Thus prepared, they are sold hot in the streets, and form a popular dish for the working classes.

Large quantities of them also are dried and ground to flour, which may be kept for some time without deteriorating. This flour, mixed with water and baked in thin sheets, forms a heavy, but sweet and nutritious cake which is highly esteemed.

In Italy the use of chestnuts as an article of food supply is very general. They are eaten as a substitute for corn-meal in the national dish called "polenta"—a form of porridge greatly liked by the poorer people. A common delicacy in the Apennines is "necci," which are flat cakes of chestnut-flour and water, baked between flat stones.

In Korea the chestnut is said to take almost the place which the potato occupies with us, being consumed raw, boiled, roasted, cooked with meat, or dried whole, as may be preferred by the eaters.

Recently in Italy some very interesting experiments have been made and the results tabulated in regard to the digestive and nutritive properties of chestnuts. One man was fed upon them for several days, taking no other food. The conclusion reached was that chestnuts, contrary to the popular impression, are very digestible and one of the most nutritious of food substances. They contain much more starch and much less oil than other kinds of common nuts.

Now and then a chestnut twig is found which has a series of burrs all along it, instead of the usual two or three that dangle together. This means that all the blossoms along the "spike" which bears the burrs have been fertilized by the pollen, whereas ordinarily only two or three of them are thus impregnated. Experts of the Department of Agriculture think that if some grafts of this unusual kind of growth can be secured, possibly the producing power of chestnut trees may be multiplied.

The Diary of a New Congressman's Wife

THE great Lady Montagu is credited with having said: "It goes far toward reconciling me to being a woman when I reflect that I am thus in no danger of marrying one." As clever and bitter a remark as was ever made against my own sex, and one that I am always moved to resent. I feel convinced that even if the witty Montagu could have looked on Page upon her wedding day she would have recanted on the spot, for Page has, during the past week, become the Marquise de Courcelles.

After all, I did not have things all my own way as I thought I should at this wedding. I had planned that the cherubic rector of St. John's Church should bless the alliance, but alas! I had reckoned without my host in the shape of the bridegroom himself, for I found that Alain de Courcelles, when he arrived, was determined that the utmost quiet and simplicity should mark the occasion because of his recent bereavement, and, secondly, I had not taken into the account that there would have to be two ceremonies—a civil one and a religious one.

But when it came to the wedding breakfast I was in my glory, for it was delightfully select, being made up almost exclusively of the Diplomatic Corps, with a few high dignitaries and officials of the Capital. I got in a few revengeful strokes on some one or two of the smart set by omitting them from the invitation list. As for Jules and the wedding feast, I never saw anything more beautiful than the dishes which he prepared. On the morning of the wedding, at rather an unearthly hour, I noticed Jules, in his peaked white cap, peering very anxiously up at the soft May sky. He wore so anxious a look that I feared some dire mishap had befallen him in the way of failure of some one of his masterpieces, and that he was invoking the aid of Heaven in consequence. I asked quickly:

"What are you looking for, Jules? I hope nothing has gone amiss with any of your arrangements?"

"Oh, no, madame; I look at ze sky to see if it haf ze smile. Ze day should be wizout ze cloud, like ze Hill of Olympe. It should be happy like ze face of mademoiselle."

I was relieved; Jules was merely anxious for the bride to have a fair day, but I wondered what he could possibly know about the Hill of Olympus. I felt, however, that his part in the day would be performed in splendid shape, but I was by no means so sure of Robert or of Cousin Melinda. Robert began the day by waxing sarcastic on the subject of the formality and ceremony to be observed, and I fear that my temper had become a trifle ruffled, for I snapped him into subjection by inviting him to take himself out of the house until he should be wanted. He replied with mock meekness:

"I suppose, Agatha, that in inviting me to take myself out of the way you must be working along on the plan of that wise old saw that 'Ceremony is the invention of wise men to keep fools at a distance?'"

I had to smile, but I reminded him that I was not alone in thinking all this despised ceremony necessary. I said severely:

"Goldsmith says, Robert, that neither politics nor religion should be divested of ceremony, and that all ranks should be impressed with a sense of subordination, whether it be effected by a diamond buckle, a virtuous edict, a sumptuary law or a glass necklace."

I had scarcely got rid of Robert when I encountered Cousin Melinda, who was inspecting the final work of the decorators who had had possession of the house for twenty-four hours. I said enthusiastically:

"Isn't everything beautiful?"

"Y-e-s," she replied doubtfully, "but I don't like those outlandish colors being woven into the decorations over there. I think they spoil the rest. Anyhow, it is not nearly so handsome as our town hall in Spruce City was the night the Trades Unions gave their banquet to the Mayor."

I was in despair. After all my effort, to be compared to the Trades Union banquet out in Spruce City!

"But, cousin, that decoration over there which you object to is the tricolor of France. This wedding is an international one, and you know that Alain de Courcelles is a descendant of Lafayette. And we all honor Lafayette."

"You don't say so! If he's really one of the 'Lay-fayette' family why that makes him almost an American. But really, Agatha, I should much rather have had a big wedding cake built up high, with a sugar candy bride and groom on the top of it, than all those little satin boxes with only a scrap of cake inside. It looks to me kind of skimpy."

However, outside of Robert's and Cousin Melinda's remarks the wedding arrangements met with nothing but praise, and what with the presence of Mr. Cambon, the French Ambassador, and Lord Pauncefote, together with all the other Embassies and Legations and the magnificent flowers from the Executive Mansion, I felt that my social cup was full. In looking back over my arduous season,-in which I had worked more hours out of the twenty-four and far harder than any day laborer, I felt, in contemplating this crowning effort, that I had succeeded, and that, as the French say, "I had arrived."

When all was over, with every guest departed and the bride gone, I drove over to Fort Myer to see the wonderful exhibition drill by the cavalry stationed there. The President had ordered this special drill in honor of Governor Roosevelt, and the occasion was brilliant in every sense of the word. I tried to inveigle Robert into going with me, but no, he pleaded committee work and betook himself back to the Capitol. Truth is; Robert detests my carriages, and I accuse him of being in awe of the coachman and footman. At any rate, he will not drive in state with me, but prefers to jump on and off the democratic street car instead. But if Robert would not go, I at least dragooned Senator P—— into attending me, and thither we drove early in the afternoon. As every one of my Diplomatic guests, together with all the other big-wigs who had been at the wedding, also were guests at this drill, it seemed like a brilliant prolongation of the wedding festivity.

When you talk about John Tyler Morgan, my son, you are talking about a man in the fullest sense of what the word means

We arrived just a little before the Presidential party and long before the guest of honor put in an appearance. Indeed, the Rough Rider Governor was distinctly late in coming, and, therefore, some of the ceremony of his greeting had to be dispensed with, but he looked as smiling as possible, though a trifle red in the face as though from undue haste.

It must have been considerable satisfaction to him to know that at least during this one afternoon of his stay in Washington he was safe from the political newsmonger. For there could be no possible chance for anybody to take his eyes off the exciting feats going on in the tanbark ring long enough to spy upon him, and to wonder if, after all his denials, he did not have a Vice-Presidential boom stowed away in his pocket somewhere out of sight, or whether in his brief, smiling greeting to the President he had not communicated a sort of "Barkis is willin'" state of mind, or that his nod to the Secretary of War or smile to the Honorable Perry Heath did not indicate some deep political understanding.

The exhibition was given in the big drill hall and the guests were received by the commanding officer, Major Kingsbury, and when the President and Mrs. McKinley entered the hall the band struck up that tune of all tunes, Hail to the Chief, which I am convinced could not be pronounced by the most indulgent musical critic to be "little dew-drops of celestial melody." If I were the President of the United States I would issue a royal ukase that no band in the military service of the country should ever again strike up a bar of Hail to the Chief, under penalty of death. If a "song will outlive all sermons in the memory," as some one says, why I am sure that this ugly ditty will do the same, though perhaps not for the same cause.

The exhibition drill was simply the most wonderful thing I ever saw. It would make the Cossack and the cowboy seem hopeless clods on horseback. Promptly at the sound of a bugle-call the doors were swung open and Troop G, in command of Captain Hardie, the celebrated drill-master, rode in. They were put through every manœuvre that a soldier is required to know in his training with his horse. There were fancy drills and sword exercise, and this part of the program was concluded with the entire command being drawn up in front of the Commander-in-Chief with sabres held at salute, which the President responded to by standing with uplifted hat. This was followed by a detachment from Troop I riding in without coats or hats, with blankets in lieu of saddles, and going through the most thrilling feats of mounting and dismounting in full gallop, jumping hurdles and almost flying from one horse to another and to the ground and back while the animals were in the air going over obstructions.

This exhibition of hurdle-jumping was concluded by the horses jumping in pairs, then by fours, then by eights, and, as a climax, in half troop fronts. One most exciting thing was when a dozen troopers rode to the centre of the tanbark and, making their horses lie down, knelt behind them, the rest of them riding like Indians in a mad circle around them pouring in a hot fusillade of shots.

The enthusiasm of the distinguished guests knew no bounds, and Governor Teddy was the most enthusiastic of the whole assemblage. It seemed to me that this tanbark had stretched out into boundless plains and that I was looking upon a veritable attack and repulse. I felt as though I had been through an Indian campaign of thumb-nail proportions.

When it was all over the Senator returned with me to town, and I persuaded him to remain and dine with us and talk over with Robert the political situation and the prospects for adjournment. During the talk Robert boasted that so far as the House was concerned, it had its business so well in hand that it could adjourn almost any day.

"Yes," said the Senator shaking his head, "I have heard that talk before about early June adjournments, and I am not wholly convinced that Congress will get away before the Philadelphia Convention. I am convinced, however, of one thing, that, should we have to stay here till after the Philadelphia Convention, we Republicans would not be willing in that event to adjourn till after the Kansas City Convention."

"Good Heavens!" I exclaimed, "what wit would there be in staying here into July?"

"Why, Agatha," broke in Robert, "the reason of that would be that we'd want to be sure of what they meant to do at Kansas City, and we might want to assail them by legislation, or offset them in some way, so we should hold on."

"Mercy, what a conscienceless set of schemers you all are!" I exclaimed in disgust.

"Oh, well," laughed the Senator half cynically, "it is a well-known fact that so far as conscience goes in these matters, 'no one has any conscience but the onlooker.'"

"And, by the way, Senator P——," said Robert, "I heard that fine old fellow, Senator Morgan, announce very emphatically that he would not attend the Kansas City Convention. He tells me that he never goes to a convention. He considers, he says, that conventions violate one of the very fundamental principles of the Constitution, in that they virtually repeal that very wise provision which looks to the election of our Presidents by a body of chosen electors, very much as Senators are provided to be chosen by the State Legislatures instead of by the people directly. Conventions, he says, by nominating candidates for the Presidency, take away from the electors that freedom of choice which it was the intention to provide, so that instead of the electors choosing the President they merely record the will of the conventions expressed in advance. There is much force in his view," Robert went on, "for look at the present situation. One convention has nominated Debs; another has nominated Barker; another Bryan, and there are yet to be heard from the Democratic Convention, the Republican Convention, and Heaven knows how many more, so that, in the immortal query of the Alabama Congressman, we are tempted to ask, 'Where are we at?'"

"Yes," said the Senator, "there is force in Morgan's statement. When you talk about John Tyler Morgan, any way, you are talking about a man in the fullest sense of what the word means. You know, perhaps, that he is a descendant of the last Virginia President, John Tyler? Well, he is a wonder! He is one of the ablest lawyers in the Senate, and as far as an expounder of the Constitution goes he could knock the whole Foreign Relations Committee out with one hand tied behind his back. He is one of the best talkers we have ever had in the Chamber. He is terse, lucid and musical. He never pauses for a word but seems always to have the most fitting one ready. When he first came to the Senate, like all Southerners, he had but one viewpoint of the Constitution. After he had been here a while he began to study all the questions that arose from both points of view, from the standpoint of North as well as South. He made an exhaustive study of all our famous Northern statesmen and their methods of thought, with the result that Morgan is a tremendous factor in legislation."

"He is making a gallant fight for this Canal bill, and it was a signal triumph for him to get it out of committee and favorably reported, but he meets powerful opposition."

"Oh, well," replied the Senator, "he's one of those men of whom Emerson speaks, who 'rise refreshed on hearing of a threat, men to whom a crisis which intimidates and paralyzes the majority comes graceful and beloved as a bride.'"

"When is the finale to be reached in the Clark case?" asked I, rather irrelevantly.

"Well," said the Senator, "I think we may look for some startling conclusion either one way or another pretty soon."

The Senator when he made this remark did not dream what a sensational dénouement was to be sprung in the Senate. On the day that had been appointed for Mr. Chandler to press his resolution declaring Mr. Clark's seat vacant, I went up to the Senate prepared to enjoy a stormy scene, but instead of a scene there was a bolt out of a clear sky—one that left the astute Mr. Chandler completely dumb and outwitted.

A spirited contest was evidently expected, for every Senator was at his desk and there was an atmosphere of waiting everywhere apparent. No sooner was the morning hour over than Mr. Clark arose from his desk and began to address the Chair in a quiet, though tense, voice. Scarcely had his first words been uttered when it seemed to me that half the Senators on the floor crossed over to his side of the chamber where they could breathlessly follow his even, quiet words. He began with a vigorous and sharp arraignment of the committee's action and report and followed with an explanation of political and business affairs in Montana, making a complete denial of any and all charges which have been made against him.

His entire address was accorded an eager attention, rare even in the Senate, and throughout Mr. Chandler's face wore a grim and sardonic smile. It was not until Mr. Clark reached the closing remarks that he evinced any emotion, and this was when he adverted to his desire to hand down to his children a name untarnished by even the hint of disgrace. There was a pause here in his remarks, and there was a profound hush all over the Chamber, then quickly the Montana Senator resumed his remarks and announced that he had tendered his resignation. This announcement was such a shock that it created a buzz and stir all over the Chamber which drowned the speaker's voice.

Then followed a most remarkable demonstration which seemed to me altogether out of harmony with the supposed opposition to the Senator from Montana, for almost the entire Senate irrespective of party crowded around him, and he was given an ovation such as I never saw accorded to any man in that Chamber before, and the Chair made no effort to control the demonstration. The Senate was only recalled to itself finally by Mr. Chandler's announcement that the resolution relating to Mr. Clark would go over until the next day.

But this remarkable political drama was not to end here, for before the Senate had digested this dramatic performance came the news over the wire of the appointment of Mr. Clark to fill the vacancy his own resignation had created. Could anything have been more complete in the way of rout than this to the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections?

I was talking with Robert and Senator P—— and asked what the Senate could do about it.

"I don't see what we can do; what we shall try to do is another matter, but Chandler will no doubt object to Clark's being sworn in on these new credentials. He will probably have the papers referred to our committee and there try to bury them until the session comes to an end. He will hope by this means to keep Mr. Clark out of the Senate and thus have the last throw of the dice."

"But has he the power? Can he do all this?"

"No, I'm inclined to think he cannot. If Chandler had as ample power to manage the Senate as he has ample will to do, perhaps he could succeed in ousting Clark, but ample will and ample wit won't do it alone. There are several of us, notably Frye and Allison, who think, with me, that Clark has us in a tight place. This coup of his was brilliant, and for the life of me I cannot but think we are outwitted and that we would do well to make the best of it."

"Well, for my part," said I, "it seems to me to be only a trick, and in keeping with the whole proceeding from start to finish. It would seem as though a Senatorship nowadays was put up to the highest bidder, and that the old saying is clearly borne out that 'when a king creates an office, Providence at once creates a fool to buy it.'"

The Reward of the Systematic

By Oliver Otis Howard

MAJOR-GENERAL U. S. ARMY (RETIRED)

HOW familiar to every New England schoolboy were the lines of Alexander Pope:

"Order is Heav'n's first law; and this confest,
Some are, and must be, greater than the rest."

As they were used in our school for paraphrasing and parsing, when as a lad I began my English grammar, they impressed me, like an old proverb by which one of Dickens' characters was accustomed to regulate his life.

Of course, it goes without saying that, to a child, arrangement is a most important idea, to be so imbedded in the mind that it works and controls him, till method shall show itself in whatever he undertakes. Perhaps the mother's proverbial phrase is more nearly universal than any other: "My son, have a place for everything and everything in its place." His dog, his bobby-horse, his picture-book and his playthings generally must find their corner by bedtime. The cap, mittens, comforter and shoes ever have their chosen closet. None of us forgets how she exemplified and enforced her lessons in this respect, particularly when there were several children in the same small house.

This course faithfully followed at our house early produced in me a habit of order. Every member of our family seemed to come to it most naturally. For my wonderment and imitation, my grandfather, my father and my mother had a place for nearly every article of personal use, and they had neatness and arrangement in all places for the common use of the family. The parlor, the sitting-room, the kitchen, the pantry, the chambers and the cellar were never wanting in an order which was seldom modified or altered. The same principle extended to everything in the barn, the stable and the outbuildings, and, in fact, to the entire farm. The fences, both rail and stone-walls, the gateways and the field-bars, as I remember them, seemed to understand the will of the master and kept themselves in prime condition. Herein, I believe, is a secret of New England training—the orderly training of boys and girls. As I now recall the old schoolhouse, there was a like attention on the part of the teacher to the same principle. His own desk, with a variety of books, was always trim, and the scholars were required to be careful of their books and to put them away when not in use.

Captain Hardie, the celebrated drill-master

At the Military Academy there has always been a strict adherence to the idea of the supreme necessity of order. The body itself, after the arrival of a new cadet, who used to be called a "plebe" or sometimes only a "thing," is taken charge of by some senior official and moulded; the shoulders raised, the chest brought out, the back straightened, the limbs developed and the pace changed. To see him for the first few months a stranger has an idea of a mere automaton. And, indeed, there is soon such a perfection of form and rigidity of posture preserved in sitting and in walking, at all times when the "plebe" is under observance, that an ordinary civilian cannot help laughing at this painful exhibition of discipline; yet that very process in time gives dignity of deportment, fineness of form, strength of muscle and the perfection of health.

In the cadet-room one sees, when inspection is made, a singular regularity and completeness in all the furniture and belongings of the occupants. The mattress is folded at the head of the single bedstead, all washing arrangements present tidiness; each spike knows its accoutrement, and each rack its rifle; the very shoes have arranged themselves in perfect alignment under the foot of the bed, and every article in the open shelves somehow makes itself square with other articles with even edges. Here at the Military Academy there is no elective process. It often seems to me that the cadet's head must be primarily divided into just so many compartments, and the appropriate compartment subsequently assigned to a given professor, picked to fill it with his best teaching. Order touches the divisions of time and the divisions of labor, mental and physical, and also adheres to all Government processes.

The elaborate system which regulates the conduct of cadets by merit and demerit is very remarkable, and bears hard upon them; yet by the use of it wholesome method and effective habits of regularity and order have been secured. Of course, no moral or ethical instruction can absolutely construct an honest or godly man. Each individual soul must deal with his own great Master, and stand or fall according to the approval of an enlightened conscience; yet I think that the regularity of good moral and ethical teaching produces habits of life and conduct in young men which make them really strong, when they choose to step upward from plane to plane. There are such noble characters who are now devoting themselves to our country's service and standing fearlessly on the front line of duty. Some we know have given their lives to maintain the honor of the flag and the integrity of the Republic.

The Training of a University Crew

By Ralph D. Paine

Yale University Crew '91, '92, '93

S-L-O-W, up! Steady, all together—heave—heave! Watch your feather, Bow; you're behind, Five. Only a few strokes to the finish—show your sand and give her ten good ones. Now—one—two—three, heave, steady, four—five—lift her, everybody! V-a-a-s-t!"

It is the last pull against time over the four-mile course before the University race.

"Fastest time of the year," the coach whispers to his assistant. "Within twenty seconds of the record. They'll do!"

Three days later another four-mile pull brings victory, perhaps, and reward for infinite toil. This is the only part of the rowing man's career of which the public sees anything—this brilliant and fleeting climax of a half year's daily grind and sacrifice.

Nine Months' Work for Twenty Minutes' Racing

A championship University eight is the most perfect exhibition of trained muscular skill and delicacy, with complete harmony of interaction, evolved in the stress of athletic competition. The preparation for the twenty minutes of racing in June begins in the previous autumn with light rowing and exercise for veterans and recruits. The "heavy work" for the season does not start until the term opens early in January.

The squad which responds to the first call of the captain is oddly assorted. The old men who will form the nucleus of the eight have a distinctive swagger that is the despair of the novice. Next in point of promise are the members of the Freshman crew of the year before, from which some good material is usually hammered out. There are "hangovers" who have tried before, and many green candidates altogether in the rough. Saddest sight to a knowing observer is the crowd of Freshmen, sublime in their optimism, who "intend to make the crew for the sake of the folks." They come in all sizes, some of them so willowy that when pronounced too light to row they promptly try for the coxswainship, determined to be somewhere in the race.

The first week of training is a rheumatic nightmare even to the old men. Relaxed muscles stiffen and seem to warp in hard knots after long disuse. The work is therefore increased gradually until, at the end of the first fortnight, the daily program leaves tender Freshmen hanging exhausted over the fences of distant countrysides. The squad reports at four o'clock in the afternoon, and bounds out from the gymnasium in sweaters, rowing tights, long stockings and easy shoes, for a run of from four to eight miles. Out into the country the long line winds at a brisk trot, until the bracing air becomes precious to the laggards whose lungs are hard pressed. Usually one or two broad-beamed youths whom Nature did not build for running, trail rearward, amid prodigious puffing, grunting and stumbling. A few of these spins weed out the weaklings without need of mandate from the captain.

Preparation in the Gym and in the Tank

The squad returns to the gymnasium damp and wilted. A larger measure of anguish is in store for them. Now comes a series of calisthenic exercises for developing the arms, back and legs. With arms above the head, the men bend back, à la serpentine, and then forward, bringing the hands down until they touch the floor without bending the knees. This is a sometime feat in parlor entertaining, but try it, if you please, seventy-five times, as fast as you can, after a little jog of half a dozen miles with the bulk of your work ahead of you. Next, stand erect and squat as low as possible, straighten again, down and up, forty times the minute for two minutes.

If you still thirst for work, lie on the floor with your hands clasped beneath you, and, keeping the legs straight, raise them to the perpendicular and let them down again as many times as the foregoing schedule calls for.

All this is by way of preparation for the daily row in the tank, which as an instrument of torture should be shown with the Nuremburg relics. In this contrivance the boat is stationary, and the water is rowed past. A similar effect of never getting anywhere after tremendous effort may be gained by heaving lustily at one's boot straps.

The tank is divided in the middle by a narrow box rigged with eight outriggers and sliding seats, and is almost surrounded by about two feet of extraordinary dense water, which is forced round and round by the sweep of the oars. The blades are whittled down and a small section cut out of them to lessen the heavy drag of the water. A very slow stroke must be rowed because of this resistance, and only the foundation principles of blade, body and slide work can be taught by this makeshift which would move a galley-slave driver to pity.

A remarkable improvement was one day noticed in the rowing of a sluggish Freshman candidate. He tore his oar through the water of the tank with such amazing dash and vigor that he seemed always to be several strokes ahead of his laboring fellows. Investigation revealed that the intelligent tyro had sought the tank under cover of darkness and whittled out the hole in his oar blade until he might as well have been rowing with a picture frame.

An Impromptu Tank Drama

For two days of the Junior Promenade week at Yale the rowing-tank room is crowded with "Prom" girls and their escorts. This causes an alarming expansion of chest measure among the proud and callow neophytes, but the veteran assumes to be bored by this intrusion into business hours. So closely were the visitors packed along the unguarded edge, one afternoon, that a Washington belle was crowded into the surging waters. The oarsmen had often debated their course of action in the event of such a catastrophe. They arose, as one man, clasped their hands above their heads and dove fearlessly into the depths, two feet in the deepest soundings. They accomplished a multitudinous and thoroughly dramatic rescue, and furnished a genuine "tank drama."

That the afternoon's work of the early season is severe is shown by the losses in weight. In the two and a half hours of daily exercise the average loss is four pounds, and I have known men to drop seven pounds in this short time. Food and sleep return nearly all of this weight within twenty-four hours—a remarkable example of Nature's recuperative powers. Even after six months of arduous training, when men are supposed to have reached the limit of "fineness," contestants in the four-mile race will drop three and four pounds within a little more than twenty minutes of the heart-breaking struggle.

When the ice leaves the river or harbor late in February, the long runs and the indoor toil are done and the heavy working barge is taken out. The first day on the water marks an epoch in the annals of the season. More than likely the wind is freezing cold, and the spray turns to ice whenever it strikes oar, brace or bare, red knees. The coach, bundled in sweaters into the semblance of a Polar bear, sits in the coxswain's seat, and the eight men who are picked as the "first crew" pull the barge for two or three miles, making rather bad work of it after their practice in the staid and pacific tank.

Perhaps, as has happened more than once, a submerged oyster stake rips the boat's bottom, and the shivering castaways have to shoulder their oars, splash ashore, breaking the thin ice beyond the channel and run miles to the boathouse. But one seldom catches cold at this sort of matinée, and it is rather jolly to talk about after a brisk rubdown.

The Beginning of Social Life for the Squad

With the first of March the training-table is started. For the next four months the men must not eat or drink anything at any time except at the table, smoking is barred, and bedtime is ten thirty o'clock. The fare is no longer raw beef and dry bread as in the old and barbarous days, but a pleasant variety of wholesome food is provided in astonishing quantities. The social life of the season begins with the training-table. A dozen thoroughly manly fellows, the pick of a great University for intelligence, pluck and strength, thrown intimately together, and bound by the strongest ties of common toil and a common aim, cannot fail to get much that is good and pleasant out of such intercourse.

As soon as the sluggish barge is exchanged for the skittish racing shell, every stroke counts for the race. The old coaches begin to flock back and perch on the bow of the swift launch every afternoon, rain or shine, calm or blow. The pleasure of rowing is first tasted in these balmy spring days. Often the shell does not leave the boathouse until the wind dies with the sun, and the oarsmen stretch out on the float and doze and tan and lazily talk shop, superbly content in the perfection of physical fitness.

To coax the fractious creature of a shell to be steady on its bottom is no slight task in itself. This frail dish is sixty feet long and only twenty-four inches wide, and the most delicate handling is required of the twelve-foot oars and the eight heavy and continually shifting bodies to bring harmony and speed. There are sixty odd things one can do wrong in rowing one stroke, and the wobble of a knee, the "cocking" of a blade or the slightest break in time will destroy the rhythm of the swing or cripple the stride. Rowing has been compared in delicacy of touch and harmony of action to the response of a well-trained orchestra to the baton of the leader.

The Appearance of the Rival Crew at Red Top

May slips into June and the crew and coaches with a household brigade of cooks, waiters and followers migrate to New London and the Thames, the battleground of glorious history. Three weeks remain before the race, and the crimson flag flies from the Harvard quarters at Red Top, while the blue banner of Yale ripples defiance over the cottage at Gales Ferry. One day's routine is like the others. "Ha' pas' six, Captain," shouts the darky waiter in the first room he enters. "Ha' pas' six, number sebben," in the next, and so on until the heavy-headed household is in action. In ten minutes the cheery voice of the captain calls, "All ready," and in white flannels and sweaters the squad tumbles out into the cool, sweet air of the early June morning.

As they stride up the country road the joy of living comes to them in the bracing draughts of morning air and the pervasive vigor of their condition; brain cleared of cobwebs, muscles that stand out clean and beautiful under skins burnt black, and young blood running free after ten hours of dreamless slumber. For two miles the captain leads the way and back to the quarters and breakfast.

The eight gets out late in the forenoon, and again in the cool of the late afternoon. Several years ago this was accomplished only after manœuvring so that the substitutes of the rival crew might not dog the practice with stop-watches and field-glasses, it being their business to scurry madly in chase in a pair-oar shell, like gigantic water-spiders. A masterly stroke of strategy occasionally baffled this espionage, now sensibly discarded.

One afternoon, I remember, the Yale Freshmen were dressed in "Y," or University jerseys, and caps, and sent over the first mile of the course. The Crimson "subs" chased them furiously while the bona-fide University eight sneaked up river and round measured distances unnoticed. During that same week the Yale coaches were anxious to send the crew over the four-mile course without allowing Harvard to catch the time. The conditions were perfect late in the day, but the substitutes from Red Top lay off Gales Ferry and calmly waited for the enemy. At the usual hour the dark blue crew swung its shell into the water and pulled up the river, away from the course. At an easy stroke they jogged for two miles and down again, then paddled up to the float and carried the shell into the boathouse. Presently a string of unclothed athletes ran to the edge of the float, jumped overboard, splashed buckets of water over one another and ostentatiously fought for bath towels. The captain sung out, "Hurry up for supper, fellows," and the spies paddled down to Red Top and put up their boat. Half an hour later the Yale shell shot out across the river into the shadows of the other shore, and

Summer numbers of THE SATURDAY EVENING POST will contain an unsurpassed variety of warm weather reading — short stories, serials and special articles by the most popular writers.

Mooswa of the Boundaries

By W. A. Fraser

Mr. W. A. Fraser has written for summer numbers of the magazine a series of most engaging stories of Rod, the Boy, and his friends, the fur-bearing animals of the Northwest. Mr. Fraser knows these dwellers of the forest better than most city folk know their next-door neighbors, and he introduces into his stories a vast mass of entertaining and little-known beast-lore. He explains why Umisk, the Beaver, sleeps with his tail in the water; the habits of Whiskey Jack (whose nest no man ever found); the misfortunes of the Red Widow, and how Pisew, the Lynx, went to the bad.

Condensed Novels

By Bret Harte

Many years ago Bret Harte wrote a series of stories which he called "condensed novels" — humorous tales, in which he burlesqued the style, mannerisms and peculiarities of the authors of the day. Mr. Harte has just completed a new series of these inimitably funny literary caricatures. Admirers of Doctor Doyle should not fail to read the adventures of Hemlock Jones in his quest of The Stolen Cigar-Case; and those who are fond of Mr. Kipling will find pleasure in Bret Harte's Stories Three; tales of Moo Kow, the Cow; Puskat, the warmth-loving one; the Stalkies, and the adventures of Bleareyed, Otherwise and Mulledwiney. In Rudolph, the Resembler, the astute reader will find a new version of Anthony Hope's most popular story, and will understand how much more complicated it might have been had there been three kings instead of only two.

The Machine in Action When the boat is running well the satisfaction of rowing is profound in these finishing days. The eight blades flash out of the water so that, from behind, only one oar can be seen on either side. They go back, fast at first, then coming slowly down to the water until, with the lightning lift of shoulder and arm, they grip the water clean and sharp, while eight backs swing up as one, and eight pairs of lunging thighs finish out the power of the stroke. The handles come in easily and gracefully with the bending of the arm, then shoot away with instant speed. The backs sway forward ever rhythmically, the slides start with the quick jerk of the toes, and then slow down, until, just as arms and back are getting ready for the next stroke, this mass of fourteen hundred weight stops and starts back so carefully that the sensitive shell feels no shock, and shoots along between strokes without stop or jar. Thirty-four times a minute these eight men combine the terrific lift and heave, this delicate finish, lightning recover, and slow, careful slide action all as one harmonious mechanism. It is the poetry of motion.

Nine o'clock at night is welcomed in the quarters. At the captain's "all ready" the white clad company files into the road and stalks spectre-fashion into the country for the bedtime walk of a mile. The night air, laden with the odors of hay-fields and hedge roses, is a wonderful sleeping potion. These last weeks pass swiftly with much hard work, and much that is very pleasant to live and remember, until the last night in quarters looms as an event solemn and tragic.

The Restless Night Before the Big Race There is an unwonted quietude about the house and the men are absent-minded and restless. Even the veteran of three races tosses through an age before sleep comes, and wakens frequently. The man who must row his first race goes over every mile of the struggle again and again, until he is in a fever, and sleeps only by fits and starts. The race is to be rowed at five in the afternoon, and through the interminable day the victims try to read, decide the race by throwing dice, and play "penny ante" with feverish absorption. After luncheon the coaches go to New London to board steamers for the race and the quarters seem deserted.

At half-past four, the thin-faced, bright-eyed athletes are dressed, or rather undressed, sitting in a bunch on the float, waiting for the whistle of the referee's boat over at the start. They are not so nervous now, and sing Jolly Boating Weather until the captain tells them to save their wind.

The racing shell, which has been used only three times in practice, its bottom pot-leaded, is brought out, after the three shrill and fateful toots from the distant yacht. The stern young captain calls his men into the boat-house and says simply:

"If you are licked, I want you to know that I feel every man has done his best — you can't do any more. Get your oars."

Here all is still, and country and river seem asleep, while three miles down the stream thirty thousand people wait tumultuously to see this wisp of a shell.

There is the familiar swing and power to the stroke as the eight pulls easily over to the start, and this inspires nerve and confidence, until they paddle alongside their rivals at the stake-boat and see for the first time that they look formidably strong and businesslike. One glance at the knotted muscles and bulky bodies of the foemen, and the gorgeous observation train unwinds its clamorous length abreast of the waiting crews. Another glimpse aside, and the referee from his yacht shouts, "Harvard, are you ready?" and roars the same question to the tense and straining men from New Haven. There is no reply, and there flashes through each man's mind the things he must keep thinking of. Number Five says to himself, as if in prayer: "Watch your time, start your slide and keep your blade down," and then comes the start.

Swinging Into the Winning Stroke There is a frantic plunge and showers of spray as the oars desperately dig, dig, and the two shells lunge in startled flight down that gleaming four miles that is the end of it all. The men are undergoing little of the complicated mental gymnastics sometimes credited to the oarsmen in the crisis time. Each has his eyes on the neck of the man in front of him, and in his head is drumming the refrain of the faults that he must watch every stroke as, "slow, slow, heave, heave, hands out quicker, don't drop over."

After the first twenty strokes Number Five can see out of the tail of his eye the coxswain of the other crew dropping back; the eight swaying backs come in range one by one and Number Five knows that his boat is a length ahead when the first mile flag flashes by. The lead is increased, the faster crew is going like clockwork, and at the Navy Yard dock, half way down the course, there is enough open water in front of that other toothpick prow to make the leaders think of victory. Rowing is a matter of instinct now, as the shell flies through the long lane of yachts and where the thunder of cannon and the fog of low drifting smoke seem to threaten annihilation to the heroes of the hour.

Praise to the Winners — Credit to the Losers Aching backs are forgotten; Number Five begins to think of the speech he must make at the campus celebration in the evening; he is keenly conscious that he never felt so happy in his life, meantime pulling like a demon. The word is passed from stern to bow to raise the stroke for the final spurt, and up it goes. "Vast," yells the coxswain, as the pier of the railroad bridge flies by and eight half-naked, dripping, crazy young men turn and hug each other, shouting in hoarse gasps, and nearly upset the shell. The victors alone wait to cheer the splendid pluck of the beaten crew, which staggers across the line, and then, broken-hearted, cheers the conquerors in the pitiful ghost of their college slogan. Then they creep back up the Thames to their quarters, to sob in their bitter grief and disappointment, where they can be alone. Joy so keen and sorrow so bitter while they endure do not often come to young men.

But vanquished as well as victor have gained a measure of mental, moral and physical benefit which will stand them in staunch service when dead languages and tortuous mathematics are consigned to the limbo of memory.

A Football Incident in New York

MR. FRANK W. GRAVES, during his newspaper career, witnessed many singular scenes, but the oddest one happened, according to Mr. Graves, in the old days when the big college football teams played their star games on the New York polo grounds on Thanksgiving Day.

On the occasion mentioned Yale and Princeton had played and Yale had won.

Going up Broadway, there walked a dapper young Princeton man and a girl. Going down Broadway at the same moment were eight victorious young Yale men. They were happy, but silent, and they came straight down the street until they spied the Princeton pair.

Then still in silence, moved by a single purpose, the Yale men formed a circle, and as the other pedestrians made way for them they went around and around the Princeton pair. At first the young man was surprised, then angered, and at last he raised his cane and made a dash for liberty, whereupon the Yale men stopped and, without a word, fell upon him as they do in football, quietly, heavily and quickly.

Then, straightening themselves again into a line, the eight Yalesians stopped a moment, and in concert raised their hats to the thoroughly frightened girl, and silently resumed their march down the street.

WHAT to READ
The Books of the Week

The Bewitched Fiddle*

Mr. Seumas MacManus, who has wisely determined to make hay while the sun of favor is shining warmly upon him, has published a third volume of stories, a very little volume this time of very little stories, mere sketches most of them, trifling yet never insignificant. In his search for material—which may perhaps be running low—he has utilized scraps of folk-lore, old fables, which in various forms have been handed down to us through many generations, and thrice-told tales, like that of the uneaten dinners which were paid for by the jingling of coins. Once, and once only, Mr. MacManus attempts a tale of Irish-American life in New York, and this is the manifest failure of the book. With all the patience in the world, we are growing pardonably weary of variations upon The Christmas Carol. That immortal narrative has begotten a progeny as inexhaustible as the Nile gods. The swift conversion of a hard-hearted miser into a genial and generous sentimentalist is a theme of which writers never weary, and one which they apparently deem true to life and experience. Mr. MacManus believes that the sight of a "ten-cent" Irish flag on St. Patrick's day can change the current of a man's nature and force it into broader channels; but even the Celtic nature—more plastic than the Saxon—has hardened at fifty-three and cannot be so easily remoulded. It took more than a flag and a procession to convert old Scrooge, and we never felt sure of him.

The best stories in the book are those which give us glimpses into sleepy little Irish towns where life drones pleasantly along, unvexed by the tyranny of progress. Aughnadhrin is ideal in its way. What a wealth of leisure belongs to the loungers in its market-place! Every Saturday Mrs. Dolan, of the Long Bog, brings thither her four hens—"two muffies, a marley and a spreckly"; and every Saturday she carries them back again, nobody in Aughnadhrin dreaming of such extravagant purchases. Thus the "fowl-market" is firmly established and lends an air of bustling prosperity to the town. There is even an attempt at competition, for one fine morning Pathrick Blake, of Corabbon, offers three of his wife's chickens for sale. "But Mrs. Dolan heaped upon him such bitter reproaches for a 'low, mane, underminin' villain, who'd come and fetch in his dhirty chickens without any other rhyme or raison than to do a sthrugglin' poor woman out of her rights,' that poor Pathrick was shamed into quitting the town with more speed and a lower head than when he came in; and after that Mrs. Dolan had the entire trade of the fowl-market all to herself, the two muffies, and the marley and the spreckly."

With such a background at his command, how can Mr. MacManus be so unwise as ever to locate a story in New York?

Passengers†

Readers averse to realism and to the commonplace veracities of life cannot do better than peruse Mr. Myles Hemenway's Passengers. Here is a book guiltless, not only of probabilities but of possibilities, a book wholly wedded to the unnatural and bizarre. There are two stories in the volume; the first dealing with a fisherman prophet who preaches the coming of the judgment day; and the second with a mysterious and beautiful creature named April, for love of whom men drown themselves like flies, or kill each other with less compunction than wild beasts. In the first tale, the prophet, finding that he has miscalculated his date, sails away with Margaret Holme; in the second the fair April, having proved herself as disastrous as Helen of Troy, is slain accidentally by her husband, to his infinite distress and self-reproach.

Mr. Hemenway worships at the shrine of femininity. "Any woman," he says, "is interesting"—he is to be envied his experience; "the veriest hag, gnawed by the rough tooth of time, moves us like a play." Margaret Holme, the wife of a drunken sailor in Doomsday, is fair as a dream; but April! well, April is just a trifle beyond credence. Born and bred on a lonely island, amid rude fisherfolk, she wears flowing garments of white or blue held in place by a silken cord, while the masses of her ruddy hair are bound by a golden fillet, "cunningly fashioned, its mystical whorls bursting into a rosy blossom of fires in the single great stone of which it was the setting." That she is the "far-away daughter of courts" is held to be sufficient explanation both of her wonderful beauty and of her wonderful clothes. Appreciating this fine fact, her husband buys her velvets and silks and laces, and "a great rope of jewels" that can be wound around and around her slender body. It is all so exceedingly like a fairy tale that we feel no surprise when the fishermen stab each other and the sailors fling themselves into the sea, out of "unutterable and hopeless longing." In fact, only the death of April can prevent her from depopulating the earth, so that the greater good of the greater number requires her lamentable decease. "You who read this may think me distraught," says the writer of this singular story, and possibly he is right.

Salons Colonial and Republican*

The nation never has known so charming a feminine personality as that of Dolly Madison; or at least it has never been willing to acknowledge one. The mention of her name calls up all that is graceful, thoughtful, simple-minded, well-mannered and kind-hearted—an epitome of the hostess.

From her position it was in the nature of things that Dolly Madison could never, accurately speaking, hold a salon. Yet, in another sense, she held the only salon that this country has known. The salon was distinctly something more than a gathering, at stated or casual intervals as the case might be, of brilliant talkers and clever amateurs of the arts. It held, in the apogee of its brilliance as it shone in the Hotel de Rambouillet, a national significance. It moulded the taste of a country and fixed the standards of literature for two centuries. Even in its later extravagances and the follies of its imitators, it was the theme of a masterpiece—Les Précieuses Ridicules.

Such a salon has never been known in this country or in England. The literary dogma and dicta which went forth from the Mermaid and the Mitre were of far more weight and far wider flight than those which emanated from the circle of Lady Montagu and the other intimates of the Blue Stocking Club. Neither Ben Jonson nor Samuel Johnson, the two men who exercised the strongest influence upon English letters, was of a cast to fit gracefully into drawing-room niches. That they went and came or stayed away, to and from Lady Montagu's and Mrs. Thrales' in Streatham, is neither here nor there. Such literary pilgrimages neither shaped nor determined their tastes. They afforded them an opportunity to get off clever speeches.

Now, Dolly Madison gained and held some such a national sway in matters social as the Hotel de Rambouillet wielded over matters grammatical and æsthetic. She made the nearest approach to those qualities which the leader of the salon must have. Accordingly, it is in nowise surprising to find that Miss Wharton acknowledges that among those suggestions which prompted the writing of her book was the meeting with several persons "who distinctly remembered Mrs. Madison—the delightful Dolly." That the Colonial salons antedated the delightful Dolly, and hence that all association with them must be through a retrogressive and not an advancing sequence; also, as has been pointed out, that Mrs. Madison never could have held a salon in the strict sense of the word, only serves to clinch the points just made.

No, in America we have never had salons. Scattered spots of culture and interest in culture we have had. In the early Colonial society, and in all that it held of simplicity and dignity, there has been a widespread, a deep-seated and growing interest. Miss Wharton to her own knowledge adds the recollections of many with whom she has talked who could still recall incidents from a fast fading century. She writes intimately and clearly—can more be said of a prose style?—what is fairly a résumé of the manners of the nineteenth century.—Thornton Shrburne Hardy.

IN NEXT WEEK'S ISSUE:

HON. GALUSHA A. GROW, former Speaker of the House, gives his personal recollections of the days when debates begun on the floor of the House were not infrequently ended on the old dueling ground at Bladensburg.

To most of these famous encounters Mr. Grow was an eye-witness, and in the most celebrated of all—that with Congressman Keitt—he was a principal.

The Last Days of the Duello in Congress

By Hon. Galusha A. Grow

BUSINESS men will find exceptionally interesting reading in the first of a series of papers by Mr. Harlow N. Higinbotham, of Chicago. In these papers Mr. Higinbotham discusses in a chatty, anecdotal way the multiplex duties and responsibilities of the most important person in a great wholesale house—the credit man.

It may be very pleasant sometimes for a literary man to be made the hero of his friend's book, but if that book is successful and if it appeals to a different class of readers from those of the hero's own work, the results are not so agreeable. This is what has happened to William Butler Yeats, familiarly known as the "Irish Poet," who is supposed to be the original of Ulick Dean, in George Moore's novel, Evelyn Innes.

The novelist is of the ultra-realistic school and has well been named the English Zola. The poet, on the other hand, is a man of fine ideals and great delicacy of thought and expression. The secret leaked out and Mr. Moore's readers became seized with a burning desire to see the hero of the story. Mr. Yeats' readers, a much smaller circle, also heard about it, and came to the conclusion that their poet must be leading a double intellectual life. For some time now Mr. Yeats has been burdened by calls, letters, and by comments of all kinds in the daily press.

Henry James' Method of Work

Mr. Henry James is rarely seen in London nowadays, and the occasional visit which he pays to that city is an event in literary society. The amusements of the town have no great charm for him, and he has come to a point where his own work and the creatures of his imagination are more attractive than the chatter of London. Technically, Mr. James may still be called a resident of the capital city, but his flat is usually unoccupied or lent to some friend.

Lamb House at Rye is his real home. Rye is a quaint little walled town, perched on a hill and full of curious old brick and half-timbered houses. It was formerly one of the Cinque Ports, but the sea has receded and Rye sits on her hill by a little tidewater river, with long stretches of marsh between her and the channel. Lamb House is perhaps the most important house of the little city, yet it is only a modest establishment. An eighteenth century brick house of exquisitely simple architecture, its paneled rooms have been filled by its owner with the most carefully chosen old furniture, old pictures and old china. To some the place might seem sparsely furnished, but the most rigidly artistic house decorator would say that not one thing is wrong and that Lamb House is an almost perfect dwelling. There is a sunny garden surrounded by high brick walls and covered with the thick turf which is only found in the south of England.

Mr. James is a hard and regular worker and the best part of his day is spent in his study. It is interesting to know that Mr. James dictates all his work to a secretary, and rewrites and polishes it from a typewritten version. Considering how involved and periodic Mr. James' style has become of late years, it is marvelous that he should be able to dictate—or is, perhaps, the dictation the cause of the quality of the style? Life in Rye must, at best, be placid. Mr. James explores the country on a bicycle, geared low, takes tea at the golf club, or walks through the town. He does not play golf on the links on the downs, nor does he join in the clatter with which the Rye Harriers occasionally rouse the sleepy town as they start forth.

A New Biography of Ruskin

There is to be a new biography of Ruskin. Collingwood, his secretary, put together a tolerably interesting book; but its limitations were obvious. The style is—well, T. P. O'Connor at his most journalistic, and the contents are very deficient, especially as regards the earlier and middle periods of Ruskin's career before Collingwood knew him. How to find a new biographer? The difficulty is all the greater because any English contemporary of Ruskin is too old for the task, as is also Professor Charles Eliot Norton. The Professor's colleague as a literary executor is Mr. Wedderburn, a lawyer who shares the common disability of his profession—he cannot write. Though he who drives fat oxen need not himself be fat, it is certain that he who writes of Ruskin must have a pretty style.

Then, as to the proprieties of what to publish and what to suppress, great difficulties are in store for Ruskin's biographer. That miserable marriage of his, which he endured for several years, challenges explanations hitherto withheld. Ruskin's own version of it, as told to an intimate friend, was very simple. He said that he and the lady entered upon a platonic union, from which she receded, and he, disappointed by the association in every other respect, gladly let her go.

Ruskin, seared as he was, did not, with that, kill all thought of matrimony. Two proposals were made by him in later years, both to very young girls. "Rosie," to whom he consecrates a chapter of memories and sighs in Præterita, was, in fact, only a little girl when she met "the master." The withheld surname of the girl is La Touche; she was of an Irish family that numbered Ruskin among its friends. The attachment brought only unhappiness, and the girl, torn by religious scruples, lost her balance of mind and so died. The estrangement that followed between Ruskin and her family was afterward repaired, and to Rose La Touche's mother he addressed, perhaps, his most extended and important series of letters, all of which have been religiously preserved.

The Splendor of Gilbert Parker

An agent for an American publishing house called, not long ago, upon Gilbert Parker, the Canadian novelist, at his house in St. James Place, London. Mr. Parker makes a handsome income from his writings, and his wife has a fortune in her own name. They live in one of the aristocratic parts of London, in an imposing house. None of these things, however, ruffled the agent. He had dealt with authors before on both sides of the Atlantic and he knew many publishers who were even richer. Therefore, in setting out for Mr. Parker's house, he wore his ordinary business clothes, and in spite of the cloudiness of the day carried no umbrella. When he reached the house and ascended the marble steps that led to the glass doors he looked around him for the bell, but before he could find it, two flunkies, immaculate as to dress, immovable as to form and impassive as to face, stood like statues holding the doors apart.

With this ceremony he was ushered into a tiled vestibule at the farther end of which were more glass doors. Here, again, he paused for the electric button. But, as before, two more flunkies, cast in the same mould and clad in the same style, opened the doors for him to enter. This time he was in a handsome hall from which more doors opened upon drawing-rooms and studies. Here another and a very superior flunky met him, asked him what his errand was and took him into Mr. Parker's reception-room.

Now, this agent had called to bid for the novelist's forthcoming book. He was prepared to offer a pretty stiff figure for the same, but when he reflected that Mr. Parker wrote only one book a year, that he lived in an expensive part of London, and that five flunkies were expensive to maintain, he made up his mind that he could not afford to pay what, in accordance, he believed would be Mr. Parker's price.

Presently the author appeared, and after a pleasant chat, chiefly social in character and devoted largely to current British topics, he started to leave. Mr. Parker bade him adieu at the reception-room door. There the superior flunky took him in hand and led him to the first doors. At this point the first pair of statues received him. At the outer door stood the other pair, apparently just as they were a half hour before.

As he stepped on the outer stairs he noticed that it had begun to rain and he carefully rolled up the bottoms of his trousers. This took him a trifle longer than usual, for he was unaccustomed to London weather, and, happening to glance backward out of the tail of his eye, he saw the two flunkies, stiff as stone, with the doors wide open just as he had left them.

Then it dawned on him that it was London etiquette for flunkies to stand at "present arms" until the caller had reached the street. So he hastily descended the flight and lost himself in the crowd. As he reached the last step the flunkies vanished, the doors came to, and the Parker house resumed its natural order.

Two days later the agent summoned courage to make Mr. Parker an offer for his book by mail.

Side Lights on Senator Hanna

Senator Hanna's health is subject to the most marvelous fluctuations—in the newspapers. Stories have appeared representing him as full of vigor and busy with new plans. It must have been most trying to the Senator, for the next day his friends would learn—"from the inside," the correspondent assured them—that he was on the point of quitting politics for good.

The first story of Senator Hanna's failing health was written by a young man who was on very friendly terms with the chairman of the National Republican Committee and should have known better. A day or two after his column had appeared in print the reporter stood waiting for the elevator when he was suddenly seized from behind and hurled lightly some eight feet. When he recovered sufficiently from his surprise to look around he encountered the smiling politician who said, "Well, young man, I'll convince you of the inaccuracy of those stories you have been printing about me."

Mr. Hanna and the Pressman On one occasion a young newspaper man saw at Mr. Hanna's house an old photograph of the Senator as he looked when he wore a flowing beard.

"Oh, would you mind loaning me that portrait?" inquired the enthusiastic scribe. Mr. Hanna looked at him.

"Why, my boy, I wouldn't have that picture printed for a thousand dollars." Then the reporter, imbued with that determination characteristic of the profession, resorted to diplomacy. A few days later Senator Hanna, suspecting nothing, wrote out for him an order to a photographer to "Give bearer such photographs of my residence and such other pictures as he may desire." The enterprising newspaper man happened to be in the Hanna offices when the national chairman received a copy of the newspaper, staring from the front page of which was the tabooed picture as natural as life. He did not get angry in the least, but, instead, simply turned to the reporter and smiled in a way that meant almost as much of a tribute to the young man as would have an increase in salary.

When Senator Hanna suddenly sprang into national prominence almost in a day, four years ago, many persons who were not thoroughly conversant with his life story marveled at the acquaintance, apparently of long standing, which he possessed not only with politicians but with men and women prominent in the world of art and literature. A large volume which has a prominent place in the Hanna home explains it all. It is filled with autographic sentiments from an endless list of the men and women who occupy places of more or less prominence in the public eye, including pretty nearly everybody from Sara Bernhardt to Edward H. Townsend, of "Chimmie Fadden" fame. Senator Hanna is not in any sense what is termed a "tuft hunter," but he delights to extend the hospitality of his home to people whose intellectuality makes their conversation not only entertaining but instructive. For society, in the common interpretation of the term, the Republican manager cares little or nothing. Next to a little gathering to which cleverness is the passport, he enjoys the companionship of a few of his particular cronies with whom he can talk "shop"—which means, of course, business or politics.

A Homely Taste for Plain Things When Senator Hanna is in his home city of Cleveland he very frequently patronizes a small restaurant in the building where his offices are located. The reason for this was for a long time a secret. Senator had previously been unwavering in fidelity to the chef of the Union Club, but he broke out. The director of a political party didn't seek the unpretentious little luncheon because it saved time or trouble, but because he could always find there some delicious, old-fashioned, home-made hash.

Probably few people ever think of Senator Hanna as a contributor to charities, but nevertheless the great iron merchant follows the very excellent plan of never turning a deaf ear to the appeals for any worthy cause. The officers of the Salvation Army have always known Senator Hanna as a generous contributor, and as a rule he hands an offering to every wearer of the garb of a Sister of Charity without even inquiring the identity of the institution which she represents. During the campaign of 1896 a poor woman, who sold flowers in the building, brought to Chairman Hanna's desk at headquarters each morning a red carnation. As the fight waxed warmer the campaign manager was often either busy or absent from his office, but in a niche in the desk there was always to be found a piece of silver in payment for the offering of the flower woman.

When in the mood Senator Hanna is a famous story teller, and inasmuch as a majority of his after-dinner tales are based on personal reminiscences he has as yet escaped charges of plagiarism. In the theatre and in a good horse race he takes almost equal enjoyment. For a business man whose time has been fully occupied he is well read, but for art as exemplified in paintings he cares little. Occasionally the author of the Hanna-Payne bill indulges in some diversion that savors very much of a boyish prank. A notable instance of this was afforded when, during the last national campaign, he and President McKinley stole away from their friends one afternoon and gravely consulted a clairvoyant of great local repute in one of the suburbs of Cleveland.

The Absorption of Politics For a long time Senator Hanna persevered in the determination to sign personally every letter which went out from his office, but as the bulk of his correspondence reached enormous proportions he had to give up the ambition. Fortunately he made a great "find" in his present secretary, Elmer A. Dover. One of the qualifications which has endeared this young man to his chief is his ability to imitate exactly Mr. Hanna's signature, a qualification which had not been possessed in so remarkable a degree by any of the Senator's former assistants.

Mrs. Hanna declares that she has been virtually compelled to cultivate self-reliance since her husband went into politics. "I find that I cannot depend upon Mark any more at all," she declared the other day. "However," she continued, "I am getting bravely over my old-time cowardice. The thought of a journey alone to Constantinople does not dismay me any more now than would a trip to New York unattended a few years ago."

Song for a June Day

By Clinton Scollard

YOU and I, you and I,
Footing it together
Under God's blue dome of sky
Through the winsome weather!
Oh, the dream of being free
As the gull above the sea,
Trammeled by no tether!

Free to snatch the moment's mood,
Letting fancy thrall us;
Free to laugh, or free to brood,
If the spirit call us;
Wandering kindred of the wind,
Cousins to the swallow-kind,
Free whate'er befall us!

Gleaning all the glad and good
Teeming earth produces;
Wilding wonders of the wood
Storing for our uses;
Through the sun-enlinked hours
Learning tenderness from flowers
With their fragrant cruses.

In each loving shade-caress
Something subtle sharing;
Overtaking happiness
With its beaming bearing;
Under God's blue dome of sky
You and I, you and I,
Far together faring!

The Last Days of the Duello in Congress

By Galusha A. Grow

THE popular branch of Congress has always been a more or less turbulent body, and it would be a matter of surprise if such were not the case. Indeed, occasional outbreaks in Congress, however much they are to be deprecated, are perfectly natural. Crowd some hundreds of men together on a hot afternoon or night; fill them with the fire of partisan ardor; perplex them with doubt as to the personal gain or loss that may follow their vote on the question at issue; and instil them with envy of and ill-will toward their fellows, and you have abundant material for a row. All that is needed is an excuse, and that is too often found.

In these latter times quarrels on the floor of Congress usually end in words, but during the earlier decades of the century resort was frequently had to the code, and duelling was not uncommon among public men outside of Congress.

The encounter in which Alexander Hamilton was killed by Aaron Burr remains a lamentable and striking example of the purely political duel. Jackson, Benton, Clay, Randolph and many other prominent political leaders were participants in one or more duels before they reached middle age. Bladensburg, about three miles from Washington, was long a noted duelling ground. There occurred the meeting in which Commodore Stephen Decatur received a mortal wound at the hands of Captain James Barron, a fellow-officer, and there took place the fatal encounter between Jonathan Cilley, of New Hampshire, and William J. Graves, of Kentucky, both members of the House of Representatives.

The Fatal Duel Between Cilley and Graves

Cilley, a Democrat, in a speech on the floor of the House, charged James Watson Webb, the Whig editor of the New York Courier and Inquirer, with having accepted a bribe from the managers of the Bank of the United States. Webb without delay appeared in Washington, and sent Cilley a challenge by the hand of Graves. Cilley declined to accept the challenge on the ground that Webb was not a gentleman. Thereupon Graves, accepting the stigmatization of Webb as a personal affront, offered himself in his principal's place. This challenge was accepted, rifles were named as the weapons, and Cilley fell at the second fire. The Cilley duel aroused the public sentiment to a more intense and widespread excitement than had any such previous encounter, because of its political character and because it grew out of a discussion on the floor of Congress. One of the principal themes of discussion in the Presidential campaign of 1844 was this duel, for Clay, Wise and other Whig leaders participated more or less in its preliminaries.

For some years after Cilley's death appeals to the code were not so common as they had been formerly, especially among the members of either branch of Congress. However, the combative spirit that animated the old duello was to some extent revived by the intense political excitement that, during the decade from 1850 to 1860, attended the legislation of Congress and the crisis of the irrepressible conflict between free and slave labor institutions which culminated at Appomattox. The repeal of the Missouri Compromise and the struggle over the admission of Kansas as a free State were marked by a greater intensity of feeling than had been developed at any previous clash between these two civilizations; and its white heat dissolved political and religious ties, and dismembered the old associations of party organization and of church unity between the sections.

Moreover, during that period of acute and ever-growing sectional disagreement there was always a class of men in the House from the South who, adepts in the use of the pistol, sought to make a reputation with their constituents by pitting themselves against members from the Northern States, where single combats were not only in violation of the law, but were sternly discountenanced by public opinion. An easy method of gaining prominence, it did not always serve its purpose, and frequently these gentlemen ran against Northern members of firmness and bravery, prompt to repel an affront, and prepared to meet an antagonist in any way.

Now and then the Southerners quarreled amongst themselves. In the thirty-second Congress, which began in December, 1851, Albert G. Brown, afterward Senator, and John A. Wilcox were members of the House, from Mississippi. One day in March, 1852, the House being in committee of the whole on the state of the Union, Wilcox referred to a recent speech of Brown's in which the latter had stated there was "no party in favor of disunion or secession in Mississippi or in the United States."

"I thought," said Wilcox, "that the gentleman had too high a regard for truth to make a statement so baseless of truth."

"To prevent all misapprehension," Brown interrupted, "I desire to ask my colleague if he means to say that I have been guilty of falsehood? For that inference might be left upon the minds of some by his language."

"I have spoken explicitly enough," said Wilcox. "My language will bear no misconstruction. None whatever."

"Do you mean to say," persisted Brown, "that what I have said is false?"

"If you say," was Wilcox's rejoinder, "that there is no party in Mississippi in favor of secession or disunion you say what is false."

Here Brown, who was standing near Wilcox, struck him in the face. The blow was returned, and instantly the two men were engaged in a rough-and-tumble fight. The committee at once arose and the Speaker, resuming the chair, ordered the Sergeant-at-Arms to arrest the parties.

As soon as order was restored, Brown, asking unanimous consent, "in justice to himself and the House," to make an explanation, apologized for violating its order and decorum. Wilcox followed with a like apology, and there the matter ended.

A Spark Blown Before the Coming Blaze

The next collision on the floor, which promised a hostile meeting outside of the House, was also provoked by the burning question which then commanded the attention of Congress to the exclusion of all others. The parties to it were Francis B. Cutting, of New York, and John C. Breckinridge, of Kentucky. Cutting was a splendid speaker and one of the first lawyers of the New York bar, a man of wit and courage, and keenly sensitive to any imputation on his honor. Breckinridge, who sprang from one of the oldest and most celebrated families of Kentucky, had much the same mental and moral makeup. One day in March, 1854, in a debate on the Kansas-Nebraska bill, Cutting, referring to Breckinridge's action on the House and Senate bill, said, "he retreats, and escapes and skulks behind the Senate bill."

"I will ask the gentleman," Breckinridge interjected, "to withdraw that last word."

"I withdraw nothing that I have uttered," was Cutting's response.

"If the gentleman," answered Breckinridge, "says I skulk, he says what is false and he knows it."

"I do not, sir, upon this floor," was Cutting's reply, "answer remarks such as the member from Kentucky has just made. It belongs to a different arena."

After the adjournment of the House, Cutting sent Breckinridge a challenge which he accepted and named rifles as the weapons. Friends intervened to effect an amicable settlement, but not till Breckinridge had spent a week or more in unknown retirement at Silver Spring, the house of Francis P. Blair, senior, five miles out of Washington, in preparation for the encounter. The friendship which the elder Blair showed to the Kentuckian at this time was remembered ten years afterward, when General Early and Breckinridge halted their army for the night at Silver Spring, on their way to attack Washington. They burned to the ground the house of Montgomery Blair, Postmaster-General under Lincoln, but they spared that of his father, although their men drank all the wines and ate all the good things they found, celebrating in advance the sure victory of the morrow, which their tarry for the night turned into defeat.

The Sequel to the Assault upon Sumner

Brooks' assault on Sumner has been dealt with so often that the story of it need not be retold in this place. Inexcusable, if not wholly unprovoked, it filled the North with horror and indignation. In the Senate, Henry Wilson denounced it as "brutal, murderous and cowardly." For this language Brooks sent him a challenge by the hand of General Joseph Lane, of Oregon. Wilson's prompt reply deserves to be recalled, if only for the benefit of readers of a later generation.

"I characterized on the floor of the Senate," he wrote to Brooks, "the assault upon my colleague as brutal, murderous and cowardly. I thought so then; I think so now. I have no qualifications whatever to make in regard to those words. I have never entertained or expressed, in the Senate or elsewhere, the idea of personal responsibility in the sense of the duellist. I have always regarded duelling as the lingering relic of a barbarous civilization, which the law of the country has branded as a crime. While, therefore, I religiously believe in the right of self-defense in its broadest sense, the law of my country and the mature civilization of my whole life alike forbid me to meet you for the purpose indicated in your letter."

The challenge to Wilson, whom "religious belief in the right of self-defense" probably saved from further annoyance, was not the only one issued by Brooks. In the House a few weeks later, Anson Burlingame, of Massachusetts, made a speech on the slavery question, and devoted the latter part of it to Brooks' assault.

"On the twenty-second of May," said he, "the Senator from Massachusetts sat in the silence of the Senate chamber, when a member of the House, who had taken an oath to sustain the Constitution, stole into the Senate, that place which has hitherto been sacred against violence, and smote him as Cain smote his brother."

"That is false," answered Lawrence M. Keitt, of South Carolina, from his seat.

"I will not bandy epithets with the gentleman," rejoined Burlingame; "I am responsible for my own language; doubtless he is responsible for his."

"I am," was Keitt's response.

Brooks at once challenged Burlingame, but this time he encountered a Northern man ready to fight him in his own way. Burlingame sturdily refused to retract or modify his language, and promptly accepted a call to the field. The arrangement of details was referred by him to Lewis D. Campbell, of Ohio, who selected the rifle as a weapon, and for the meeting a place near the Clifton House, on the Canada side of Niagara Falls. Brooks, however, declined to go to Canada, for the alleged reason that he would not be safe from violence during the journey through the free States. The affair thus ended.

The Debate on Buchanan's Kansas Message

On the second of February, 1858, President Buchanan sent a message to Congress recommending the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, which was an exact copy of that of Missouri, changing merely the name of the State. It was moved to refer the message to a special committee of fifteen. This gave rise to a heated session lasting all night. Having been chairman of the Committee on Territories in the previous Congress, I was asked to take charge of the anti-Lecompton forces which sought to secure a vote on the motion referred to. Toward three o'clock in the morning I crossed to the Democratic side to consult with John Hickman, a Douglas Democrat from Pennsylvania. Just then John A. Quitman, of Mississippi, arose and asked consent to make a few remarks. We did not want talk but to keep on voting, and I promptly objected to Quitman's proposal.

"If you are going to object," shouted Lawrence M. Keitt who was sitting near, "return to your own side of the House. You have no business over here, anyway."

"This is a free hall," I responded, "and everybody has a right to be where he pleases."

At that Keitt, whose seat was in the second aisle from me, sprang to his feet, strode down into the area, and advanced up the aisle in which I was standing, closely followed by Reuben Davis, of Mississippi.

"I want to know," demanded Keitt, "what you meant by such an answer as that."

"I mean just what I said," I replied; "this is a free hall, and everybody has the right to be where he pleases."

"Sir," said Keitt, attempting to seize me by the throat, "you are a d——d, black, Republican puppy!"

"Never mind what I am," I retorted, knocking up his hand. "No negro-driver shall crack his whip over me."

Keitt again attempted to grasp me by the throat; I struck out from the shoulder and he fell to the floor. In an instant John F. Potter, of Wisconsin, closely followed by Elihu Washburn, of Illinois, and a number of others who were standing in the area in front of the Speaker's desk, came rushing up the aisle, Potter striking right and left. As he reached me he hit Davis with one hand, and Barksdale, who had hold of me—in no angry mood but in way of friendly restraint—with the other. Barksdale, not knowing where the blow came from, turned to Elihu Washburn and asked if the latter had struck him. Washburn replied that he had not.

"You are a liar," said Barksdale, and letting go of me caught hold of Washburn. Cadwalader Washburn, coming up just then and seeing Barksdale and his brother in a clinch, struck out for Barksdale and hit him a glancing blow on the forehead which knocked off his wig. Barksdale, picking it up, put it on backside first, which gave him such a grotesque appearance that everybody near by broke out into a loud guffaw. Meantime, the Speaker had called upon the Sergeant-at-Arms to restore order. The rush of members into the aisle had prevented Keitt from immediately regaining his feet, but as soon as he did the Sergeant-at-Arms led him out to the door opening into the corridor in the rear of the Speaker's desk. Then the combatants, still laughing at the ludicrous spectacle presented by Barksdale, drew off one by one, and quiet was restored.

Before that, however, many blows had been given and taken, with much pulling and hauling. Lovejoy, of Illinois, and Lamar, of Mississippi, were pawing each other in the area, each seeking to persuade the other to be still. Mott, a gray-haired Quaker from Ohio, was seen in the mêlée, his hand bleeding, but he afterward declared that he intervened in the interests of peace. Covode, of Pennsylvania, grabbed a heavy stone spittoon sitting by his desk and marched down the broad aisle into the area in front of the Speaker. In the end he placed the cuspidore on a desk and returned to his seat, but, his attention being called to it, he took it back to his seat. Questioned later as to his purpose he said he thought that some one might draw a "weepin," and if so he intended to "spot" him.

Lawrence Keitt's Public Apology to the House

The session continued till six o'clock Saturday morning, when a motion to adjourn to the following Monday was made and carried. On Monday, Keitt apologized to the House. I followed in a few words to the effect that I regretted what had occurred, and that good order should prevail in all parliamentary bodies, but that I recognized the right of self-defense as "one of man's inalienable rights to be exercised on all occasions and under all circumstances where it is necessary to protect life and person."

During the next session of Congress the Senate amended the Post-Office Appropriation bill, which had originated in the House, by increasing the rate of postage. When the bill was returned to the House I rose to a point of privilege, that, under the Constitution, the Senate could not originate a revenue bill; and, as they could not do that, they could not put a revenue measure as an amendment to a bill to which it was not germane.

I then offered a resolution in these words:

"Resolved, That the House bill making appropriations for defraying the expenses of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1860, with the Senate amendments thereto, be returned to the Senate, as section thirteen of said amendments is in the nature of a revenue bill."

—hit him a glancing blow on the forehead which knocked off his wig

The House supported my motion; the Senate, after repeated conferences, refused to leave out the amendment in question, and as a consequence the bill failed of passage. At the time no attempt was made to give the affair a partisan bias, but soon after Congress reconvened in December, 1859, Lawrence O'Brien Branch, a member of the House from North Carolina, who had been one of the conferees with me in the House and Senate disagreements on the bill, declared in debate that my real object in sending it back to the Senate had been to defeat it in order that the President might be compelled to call an extra session of Congress, and, as the Republicans had made important gains in the late election, and as I had been the Republican caucus candidate for Speaker in the preceding Congress, an early control of the organization of the House would be to my advantage.

When I obtained the floor, after reciting all of the circumstances connected with the defeat of the Post-Office bill, I said that if the gentleman from North Carolina had been as familiar with constitutional law and parliamentary precedents as his long experience in legislation would have led one to suppose, he could have found sufficient reasons to justify my conduct and that of a majority of the House without violating the parliamentary and gentlemanly courtesies recognized in all deliberative bodies by impugning the motives of his peers, and charging sordid and selfish considerations as the springs of our action. Branch demanded if he was to understand my language as imputing to him conduct that was ungentlemanly. I answered that he had impugned my motives of action, and that the impugnment of motives in a legislative body was everywhere regarded not only as unparliamentary, but as ungentlemanly under parliamentary practice and law.

The Imbroglio Over the Post-Office Bill

"The gentleman," said Branch, "has not responded to my inquiry, and I shall take his failure to respond as an affirmative answer."

"The gentleman," was my rejoinder, "can take just what he pleases."

"I will do so," said Branch.

During the session of the House next day, December 30, Governor Winslow, a member from North Carolina, handed me a challenge from Branch. It was dated December 29, and ran as follows:

> "Sir: Will you please name a time and place outside of the District of Columbia in which you will receive from me a communication in writing? L. O'B. BRANCH."

I read the note and informed Winslow that I would give him an answer in due time. That evening, after consulting with some of my friends, I sent this reply by the hand of Reuben E. Fenton:

> "Sir: Your note of the twenty-ninth instant was placed in my hands by your friend, Governor Winslow, at twelve o'clock to-day. I know of nothing that makes it necessary for me to name a time and place outside the District of Columbia to receive from you a communication in writing. Your note was doubtless—as nothing else has occurred between us—based upon remarks made by me in debate in the House of Representatives in reply to your speech impugning my motives and the integrity of my acts as a legislator. On that occasion I used no language in violation of parliamentary law, and none not warranted by your remarks thus impugning my conduct. If your note is to be considered of a hostile character I have this to reply: Regarding dueling as at variance with the precepts of the Christian religion and the sentiments of a Christian people, and it being prohibited and declared a crime by the laws enacted by the body of which we are members, I cannot recognize it as a justifiable method of settling difficulties among men, even in cases of unwarranted provocation. But my personal rights and the freedom of debate guaranteed by the Constitution I shall defend whenever and wherever they are assailed.
> "GALUSHA A. GROW."

The following day Branch published his letter and my reply in a Washington newspaper, supplementing them with the statement that he left the "whole matter to the impartial judgment of honorable men of all sections of the country." At the same time both of us were arrested and placed under bonds to keep the peace. Under the code, had Branch wished to continue the quarrel, it was his privilege to attack me on sight. Expecting such an assault from Branch, backed by some of his friends, John F. Potter the next day kept me company to and from the Capitol, but I was never molested in any way.

While the affair just referred to occurred the House was occupied with a contest for the Speakership. This contest was marked by many exciting incidents. The most memorable of these had its origin in the bitter and violent attacks made by some of the Southerners upon such of their fellow-members as had recommended, on the suggestion of Francis P. Blair, Sr., the compiling of a pamphlet containing statements as to the material resources and industries of the South compared with the North as set forth in Helper's Impending Crisis, a lately published book embodying a novel and impressive analysis of the economic disadvantages of slavery. During the Speakership contest the Republicans refrained from speech-making, but after it was ended, Owen Lovejoy, of Illinois, took the floor to reply to these Southern speeches. His speech was an argument against slavery, and never was there a more violent one.

"The principle of enslaving human beings because they are inferior is," he asserted, "the doctrine of the other side, and the doctrine of devils as well; and there is no place in the universe outside of the five points of hell where the practice and prevalence of such doctrines would not be a disgrace."

As Lovejoy spoke, in his vehemence of delivery, he advanced into the area and occupied the space fronting the Democratic seats. Angered at this action, Roger A. Pryor, of Virginia, who, with Barksdale, was sitting at the front of the Democratic side, arose, and with gestures full of menace exclaimed:

"The gentleman from Illinois shall not approach this side of the House, shaking his fists and talking as he has talked. It is bad enough to be compelled to sit here and hear him utter his treasonable and insulting language; but he shall not come on this side of the House, shaking his fist in our faces."

The Virginian had not to deal with Lovejoy alone. Potter, of Wisconsin, was instantly on his feet, and shouted:

"We listened to gentlemen on the other side for eight weeks, when they denounced the members upon this side with violent and offensive language. We listened to them quietly and heard them through. And now, sir, this side shall be heard, let the consequences be what they may."

"I make the point of order," replied Pryor, "that the gentleman shall speak from his seat; but, sir, he shall not come upon this side shaking his fist in our faces and talking in the style he has talked."

"You are doing the same thing," retorted Potter.

By this time thirty or forty members were on their feet shouting and gesticulating, while above the din could be heard the voice of Potter, declaring:

"I do not believe that side of the House can say where a member shall speak, and they shall not say it."

Order being restored, Lovejoy proceeded with his speech, the dispute as to where he should speak being settled by his taking the clerk's desk.

The Issue of the Last Challenge in Congress

Some days afterward, the publication of the Globe having been delayed, Pryor arose to a personal explanation. Potter was reported in the Globe as saying "this side shall be heard, let the consequences be what they may." Pryor complained that these words had been inserted in the report by Potter, though not used by him in the debate. This charge was denied by Potter, who explained that he had inserted the words in the official report because, though he had used them, they had accidentally been omitted by the reporter.

"The member from Virginia," he added, "erased those words, and he had no right to do it. I would have cut my right hand off before I would have done it. It was none of the gentleman's business, and he had no right to take the liberty of amending it. I stand by what I said."

"The gentleman stands by his language," rejoined Pryor. "I am very glad to hear it. I understand him then to give me the liberty of construing his remark as I please. I will put what construction upon it I please, and whether he stands by it or not the sequel will demonstrate."

"Let it demonstrate," was Potter's reply.

Mr. Breckinridge had spent a week or more in preparation for the encounter

Pryor had changed the record, but was not aware that the Government printer would not send the copy to press until it had the indorsement of the member who had spoken the words concerned in the expurgation or change. Potter was, therefore, correct in the facts when he said that a change had been made, and he was within his privilege when he made them appear in print as he claimed to have spoken them.

Pryor, through seconds he had chosen, sent Potter a peremptory challenge. This challenge was considered the same night at the rooms of John W. Forney on Pennsylvania Avenue, opposite Willard's Hotel. That gentleman, Colonels E. F. Beale and F. W. Lander, Potter and myself were present at the conference. "It is for Potter," began Forney, "to consider what is to be done."

"Dueling is a barbarous custom," was Potter's reply; "but this is an attempt to suppress free speech in Congress. I am going to accept the challenge."

"Take bowie-knives, and I'll show you how to use one," said Beale, leaping from his chair and drawing a bowie-knife from his boot-leg.

Beale's suggestion was adopted without discussion, and Lander, as Potter's second, drew up a formal note of acceptance, after which the parties to the conference separated. Lander and I were then stopping at the National and kept each other company in the walk to the hotel.

"I'll tell you what I am going to do," said Lander, "but don't let Potter know; he might not allow me to do it if he knew about it. Pryor's seconds will refuse to allow him to fight on the ground that the bowie-knife is a barbarous weapon. My principal being denounced by implication as a barbarian, I will then, following the precedent established in the Graves-Cilley duel, challenge Pryor myself, and they may select any weapons from broadswords to cannon."

Lander's forecast proved correct. Pryor's seconds when he delivered Potter's reply, promptly declared that "not recognizing this barbarous mode of settling difficulties," they could not allow their principal to engage in it. Thereupon Lander challenged Pryor and selected Beale for his second, but answer was made that, as neither Pryor nor his seconds had any quarrel with him, they could not accept his "courteous offer." On the following day Pryor returned from Virginia, where he had gone to escape arrest. It was said afterward that he repudiated the action of his seconds and would have fought with bowie-knives.

Pryor suffered from the outcome of his challenge mainly because it was believed that he had refused to fight with bowie-knives when the code prescribed that the sender of a peremptory challenge must accept whatever weapons might be named by the challenged party. Potter, on the other hand, gained from it wide popularity. In the North he was the hero of the hour, and, at the Chicago Convention of 1860, the Republicans of Missouri presented him with a bowie-knife seven feet in length. On one side of the blade was the inscription, "Presented to John F. Potter by the Republicans of Missouri," and on the other appeared the words, "Will always meet a 'Pryor' engagement."

Pryor's challenge to Potter was the last sent by one member of Congress to another. The duello in Congress ended with the opening of the Rebellion.

As she was turning away from the window a horseman appeared

A Widow of the Santa Ana Valley

By Bret Harte

Copyright, 1910, by The Curtis Publishing Company. Copyright in Great Britain

THE Widow Wade was standing at her bedroom window, staring out in that vague instinct which compels humanity in moments of doubt and perplexity to seek this change of observation for superior illumination. Not that Mrs. Wade's disturbance was of a serious character. She had passed the acute stage of widowhood by at least two years, and the slight redness of her soft eyelids as well as the droop of her pretty mouth were merely the recognized outward and visible signs of the grievously minded religious community in which she lived. The mourning she still wore was also partly in conformity with the sad-colored garments of her neighbors and the necessities of the rainy season. She was in comfortable circumstances, the mistress of a large ranch in the valley, which had lately become more valuable by the extension of a wagon road through its centre. She was simply worrying whether she should go to a "sociable," ending with a "dance"—a daring innovation of some strangers—at the new hotel, or continue to eschew such follies that were, according to local belief, unsuited to "a vale of tears."

Indeed, at this moment the prospect she gazed abstractedly upon seemed to justify that lugubrious description. The Santa Ana Valley—a long, monotonous level—was dimly visible through moving curtains of rain or veils of mist to the black mourning edge of the horizon, and had looked like that for months. The valley—in some remote epoch an arm of the San Francisco Bay—every rainy season seemed to be trying to revert to its original condition, and long after the early spring had laid on its liberal color in strips, bands and patches of blue and yellow, the blossoms of mustard and lupin glistened like wet paint. Nevertheless, on that rich alluvial soil Nature's tears seemed only to fatten the widow's acres and increase her crops. Her neighbors, too, were equally prosperous. Yet for six months of the year the recognized expression of Santa Ana was one of sadness, and for the other six months—of resignation. Mrs. Wade had yielded early to this influence, as she had to others, in the weakness of her gentle nature, and partly as it was more becoming to the singular tragedy that had made her a widow.

For the late Mr. Wade had been found dead with a bullet through his head in a secluded part of the road over Heavy Tree Hill, in Sonora County. Near him lay two other bodies, one afterward identified as John Stubbs—a resident of the hill, and probably a traveling companion of Wade's—and the other a noted desperado and highwayman, still masked, as at the moment of the attack. Wade and his companion had probably sold their lives dearly and against odds, for another mask was found on the ground, indicating that the attack was not single-handed, and as Wade's body had not yet been rifled, it was evident that the remaining highwayman had fled in haste. The hue and cry had been given by apparently the only one of the travelers who escaped, but, as he was hastening to take the overland coach to the East at the time, his testimony could not be submitted to the Coroner's deliberation. The facts, however, were sufficiently plain for a verdict of willful murder against the highwayman, although it was believed that the absent witness had basely deserted his companion and left him to his fate, or, as it was suggested by others, that he might even have been an accomplice. It was this circumstance which protracted comment on the incident and the sufferings of the widow far beyond that rapid obliteration which usually overtook such affairs in the feverish haste of the early days. It caused her to remove to Santa Ana, where her old father had feebly ranched "a quarter-section" in the valley. He survived her husband only a few months, leaving her the property and once more in mourning. Perhaps this continuity of woe endeared her to a neighborhood where distinctive ravages of diphtheria or scarlet fever gave a kind of social preeminence to any household, and she was assisted so sympathetically by her neighbors in the management of the ranch that, from an unkempt and wasteful wilderness, it became paying property. The slim, willowy figure, soft, red-lidded eyes and deep crêpe of "Sister Wade" at church or prayer-meeting were grateful to the soul of these gloomy worshipers, and in time she herself found that the arm of these dyspeptics of mind and body was nevertheless strong and sustaining. Small wonder that she should hesitate to-night about plunging into inconsistent, even though trifling, frivolities.

But apart from this superficial reason there was another instinctive one deep down in the recesses of Mrs. Wade's timid heart which she had secretly kept to herself, and, indeed, would have tearfully resented had it been offered by another. The late Mr. Wade had been, in fact, a singular example of an idle, frivolous existence carried to a manlike excess. Besides being a patron of amusements, Mr. Wade gambled, raced and drank. He was often home late, and sometimes not at all. Not that this conduct was exceptional in the "roaring days" of Heavy Tree Hill, but it had given Mrs. Wade, perhaps, an undue preference for a less uncertain, if even a more serious life. His tragic death was of course a kind of martyrdom which exalted him in the feminine mind to a saintly memory, yet Mrs. Wade was not without a certain relief in that. It was voiced, perhaps crudely, by the widow of Abner Drake in a visit of condolence to the tearful Mrs. Wade a few days after Wade's death. "It's a vale o' sorrow, Mrs. Wade," said the sympathizer, "but it has its ups and downs, and I reckon ye'll be feelin' soon pretty much as I did about Abner when he was took. It was mighty soothin' and comfortin' to feel that whatever might happen now I always knew jist whar Abner was passin' his nights." Poor slim Mrs. Wade had no disquieting sense of humor to interfere with her reception of this large truth, and she accepted it with a burst of reminiscent tears.

A long volleying shower had just passed down the level landscape and was followed by a rolling mist from the warm, saturated soil like the smoke of the discharge. Through it she could see a faint lightening of the hidden sun, again darkening through a sudden onset of rain, and changing, as with her conflicting doubts and resolutions. Thus gazing, she was vaguely conscious of an addition to the landscape in the shape of a man who was passing down the road with a pack on his back like the tramping "prospectors" she had often seen at Heavy Tree Hill. That memory apparently settled her vacillating mind; she determined she would not go to the dance. But as she was turning away from the window, a second figure, a horseman, appeared in another direction by a cross road, a shorter cut through her domain. This she had no difficulty in recognizing as one of the strangers who were getting up the dance. She had noticed him at church on the previous Sunday. As he passed the house he appeared to be gazing at it so earnestly that she drew back from the window lest she should be seen. And then, for no reason whatever, she changed her mind once more and resolved to go to the dance. Gravely announcing this fact to the wife of her superintendent, who kept house with her in her loneliness, she thought nothing more about it. She would go in her mourning, with perhaps the addition of a white collar and frill.

It was evident, however, that Santa Ana thought a good deal more than she did of this new idea, which seemed a part of the innovation already begun by the building of the new hotel. It was argued by some that as the new church and new schoolhouse had been opened with prayer, it was only natural that a lighter festivity should inaugurate the opening of the hotel. "I reckon that dancin' is about the next thing to travelin' for gettin' up an appetite for refreshments, and that's what the landlord is kalkilatin' to serve," was the remark of a gloomy but practical citizen on the veranda of The Valley Emporium. "That's so," rejoined a bystander, "and I notice on that last box o' pills I got for chills, the directions say that a little 'agreeable exercise'—not too violent—is a great assistance to the working o' the pills."

"I reckon that Mr. Brooks, who's down here lookin' after mill property, got up the dance. He's been 'round town canvassin' all the women folks and drummin' up likely gels for it. They say he actually sent an invite to the Widder Wade," remarked another lounger. "Gosh! he's got cheek!"

"Well, gentlemen," said the proprietor judicially, "while we don't intend to hev any minin' camp fandangos or 'Frisco falals 'round Santa Any (Santa Ana was proud of its simple agricultural virtues), I ain't so hard-shelled as not to give new things a fair trial. And, after all, it's the women folk that has the say about it. Why, there's old Miss Ford sez she hasn't kicked a feet sence she left Mizoori, but wouldn't mind tryin' it ag'in. Ez to Brooks takin' that trouble—well, I suppose it's along o' his bein' healthy!" He heaved a deep, dyspeptic sigh which was faintly echoed by the others. "Why, look at him now, ridin' 'round on that black hoss o' his, in the wet since daylight, and not carin' for blind chills or rheumatiz!"

He was looking at a serape-draped horseman, the one the widow had seen on the previous night, who was now cantering slowly up the street. Seeing the group on the veranda, he rode up, threw himself lightly from his saddle, and joined them. He was an alert, determined, good-looking fellow of about thirty-five, whose smooth, smiling face hardly commended itself to Santa Ana, though his eyes were distinctly sympathetic. He glanced at the depressed group around him and became ominously serious.

"When did it happen?" he asked gravely.

"What happen?" said the nearest bystander.

"The Funeral, Flood, Fight or Fire. Which of the four F's was it?"

"What are ye talkin' about?" said the proprietor stiffly, scenting some dangerous humor.

"You," said Brooks promptly. "You're all standing here croaking like crows this fine morning. I passed your farm, Johnson, not an hour ago, the wheat just climbing out of the black adobe mud as thick as rows of pins on paper; what have you to grumble at? I saw your stock, Briggs, over on Two Mile Bottom, waddling along, fat as the adobe they were sticking in, their coats shining like fresh paint; what's the matter with you? And," turning to the proprietor, "there's your shed, Saunders, over on the creek, just bursting with last year's grain that you know has gone up two hundred per cent. since you bought it at a bargain: what are you growling at? It's enough to provoke a Fire or a Famine to hear you all groaning—and take care it don't some day, as a lesson to you."

All this was so perfectly true of the prosperous burghers that they could not for a moment reply. But Briggs had recourse to what he believed to be a retaliatory taunt. "I heard you've been askin' Widow Wade to come to your dance," he said with a wink at the others. "Of course she said 'Yes!'"

"Of course she did," returned Brooks coolly. "I've just got her note."

"What!" ejaculated the three men together, "Mrs. Wade comin'!"

"Certainly. Why shouldn't she? And it would do you good to come, too, and shake the limp dampness out of you," returned Brooks as he quietly remounted his horse and cantered away.

"Darned ef I don't think he's got his eye on the Widder," said Johnson faintly.

"Or the quarter-section," added Briggs gloomily.

For all that, the eventful evening came, with many lights in the staring, undraped windows of the hotel, coldly bright bunting on the still damp walls of the long dining-room, and a gentle downpour from the hidden skies above. A close carryall was especially selected to bring Mrs. Wade and her housekeeper. The widow arrived, looking a little slimmer than usual in her closely buttoned black dress, white collar and cuffs, very glistening in eye and in hair—whose glossy black ringlets were perhaps more elaborately arranged than was her custom—and with a faint coming and going of color, due, perhaps, to her agitation at this tentative reëntering into worldly life, which was nevertheless quite virginal in effect. A vague solemnity pervaded the introductory proceedings, and a singular want of sociability was visible in the "sociable" part of the entertainment. People talked in whispers or with that grave precision which indicates good manners in rural communities; conversed painfully with other people whom they did not want to talk to, rather than appear to be alone, or rushed aimlessly together like water drops, and then floated in broken, adherent masses over the floor. The widow became a hopeless religious centre of deacons and Sunday-school teachers, which Brooks, untiring yet fruitless in his attempt to produce gayety, tried in vain to break. To this gloom the untried dangers of the impending dance duly prefigured by a lonely cottage piano and two violins in a desert of expanse added a nervous chill. When at last the music struck up—somewhat hesitatingly and protestingly, from the circumstance that the player was the church organist and fumbled mechanically for his stops—the attempt to make up a cotillon set was left to the heroic Brooks. Yet he barely escaped disaster when, in posing the couples, he incautiously begged them to look a little less as if they were waiting for the coffin to be borne down the aisle between them, and was rewarded by a burst of tears from Mrs. Johnson, who had lost a child two years before, and who had to be led away, while her place in the set was taken by another. Yet the cotillon passed off; a Spanish dance succeeding "Money Musk" with the Virginia reel put a slight intoxicating vibration into the air, and healthy youth at last asserted itself in a score of freckled but buxom girls in white muslin, with romping figures and laughter at the lower end of the room. Still a rigid decorum reigned among the older dancers, and the figures were called out in grave formality, as if, to Brooks' fancy, they were hymns given from the pulpit, until at the close of the set in half real, half mock despair he turned desperately to Mrs. Wade, his partner:

"Do you waltz?"

Mrs. Wade hesitated. She had, before marriage, and was a good waltzer.

"I do," she said timidly, "but do you think they——"

But before the poor widow could formulate her fears as to the reception of "round dances," Brooks had darted to the piano, and the next moment she heard with a "fearful joy" the opening bars of a waltz. It was an old Julien waltz, fresh still in the fifties, daring, provocative to foot, swamping to intellect, arresting to judgment, irresistible, supreme! Before Mrs. Wade could protest Brooks' arm had gathered up her slim figure, and with one quick, backward sweep and swirl they were off! The floor was cleared for them in a sudden bewilderment of alarm—a suspense of burning curiosity. The widow's little feet tripped quickly, her long black skirt swung out; as she turned the corner there was not only a sudden revelation of her pretty ankles, but, what was more startling, a dazzling flash of frilled and laced petticoat which at once convinced every woman in the room that the act had been premeditated for days! Yet even that criticism was presently forgotten in the pervading intoxication of the music and the movement. The younger people fell into it with wild rompings, whirlings, and claspings of hands and waists. And, stranger than all, a corybantic enthusiasm seized upon the more emotional among their elders, and those priests and priestesses of Cybele who were famous for their frenzy and passion in camp-meetings seemed to find an equal expression that night in the waltz. And when, flushed and panting, Mrs. Wade at last halted on the arm of her partner, they were nearly knocked over by the revolving Johnson and Mrs. Stubbs in a whirl of gloomy exaltation! They all waltzed together until the long room shook, and the very bunting on the walls waved and fluttered with the gyrations of these revolving dervishes. Nobody knew, nobody cared, how long this frenzy lasted—it ceased only with the collapse of the musicians. Then with much vague bewilderment, inward trepidation, awkward and incoherent partings, everybody went dazedly home; there was no other dancing after that—the waltz was the one event of the festival and of the history of Santa Ana. And later that night, when the timid Mrs. Wade, in the seclusion of her own room and the disrobing of her slim figure, glanced at her spotless, frilled and laced petticoat lying on a chair, a faint smile—the first of her widowhood—curved the corners of her pretty mouth.

A week of ominous silence regarding the festival succeeded in Santa Ana. The local paper gave the fullest particulars of the opening of the hotel, but contented itself with saying, "The entertainment concluded with a dance." Mr. Brooks, who felt himself compelled to call upon his late charming partner twice during the week, characteristically soothed her anxieties as to the result.

"The fact of it is, Mrs. Wade, there's really nobody in particular to blame, and that's what gets them! They're all mixed up in it; and when old Johnson tried to be nasty the other evening and hoped you hadn't suffered from your exertions that night, I told him you hadn't quite recovered yet from the physical shock of having been run into by him and Mrs. Stubbs, but that you being a lady, you didn't tell just how you felt at the exhibition he and she made of themselves. That shut him up."

"But you shouldn't have said that," said Mrs. Wade with a frightened little smile.

"No matter," returned Brooks cheerfully, "I'll take the blame of it with the others. You see, they'll have to have a scapegoat, and I'm just the man, for I got up the dance! And as I'm going away I suppose I shall bear off the sin with me in the wilderness."

"You're going away," repeated Mrs. Wade in more genuine concern.

"Not for long," returned Brooks laughingly. "I came here to look up a mill site and I've found it. Meantime I think I've opened their eyes."

"You have opened mine," said the widow with timid frankness.

They were soft, pretty eyes when opened, in spite of their heavy red lids, and Mr. Brooks thought that Santa Ana would be no worse if they remained open. Possibly he looked it, for Mrs. Wade said hurriedlly: "I mean—that is—I've been thinking that life needn't always be as gloomy as we make it here. And even here, you know, Mr. Brooks, we have six months sunshine—though we always forget it in the rainy season."

"That's so," said Brooks cheerfully; "I once lost a heap of money through my own foolishness and I've managed to forget it, and I even reckon to get it back again out of Santa Ana if my mill speculation holds good. So good-by, Mrs. Wade—but not for long." He shook her hand and departed, leaving the widow conscious of a certain sympathetic confidence, and a little grateful for—she knew not what.

This feeling remained with her most of the afternoon and even imparted a certain gayety to her spirits, to the extent of causing her to hum softly to herself, the air being, oddly enough, the Julien waltz. And when, later in the day, as the shadows were closing in with the rain, word was brought to her that a stranger wished to see her in the sitting-room, she carried a less mournful mind to this function of her existence. For Mrs. Wade was accustomed to give audience to travelling agents, tradesmen, working-hands and servants as châtelaine of her ranch, and the occasion was not novel. Yet on entering the room, which she used partly as an office, she found some difficulty in classifying the stranger, who at the first glance reminded her of the tramping miner she had seen that night from her window. He was rather incongruously dressed, some articles of his apparel being finer than others; he wore a diamond pin in a scarf folded over a rough "hickory" shirt; his light trousers were tucked in common mining boots that bore stains of travel, and a suggestion that he had slept in his clothes. What she could see of his unshaven face in that uncertain light expressed a kind of dogged concentration, overlaid by an assumption of ease. He got up as she came in, and with a slight "How do, ma'am," shut the door behind her and glanced furtively around the room.

"What I've got to say to ye, Mrs. Wade—as I reckon you be—is strictly private and confidential! Why, ye'll see afore I get through. But I thought I might just as well caution ye ag'in our being disturbed."

Overcoming a slight instinct of repulsion, Mrs. Wade returned: "You can speak to me here; no one will interrupt you—unless I call them," she added with feminine caution.

"And I reckon ye won't do that," he said with a grim smile. "You are the widow o' Pulaski Wade, late o' Heavy Tree Hill, I reckon?"

"I am," said Mrs. Wade.

"And your husband's berried up thar in the graveyard with a monument over him setting forth his virtues ez a Christian and a square man, and a high-minded citizen! And that he was foully murdered by highwaymen?"

"Yes," said Mrs. Wade, "that is the inscription."

"Well, ma'am, a bigger pack o' lies never was cut on stone!"

Mrs. Wade arose, half in indignation, half in vague terror.

"Keep your sittin'," said the stranger with a warning wave of his hand. "Wait till I'm through and then you can call in the hull State o' California—ef ye want."

The stranger's manner was so doggedly confident that Mrs. Wade sunk back tremblingly in her chair. The man put his slouch hat on his knee, twirled it around once or twice, and then said with the same stubborn deliberation: "The highwayman in that business was your husband—Pulaski Wade and his gang—and he was killed by one o' the men he was robbin'. Ye see, ma'am, it used to be your husband's little game to rope in three or four strangers in a poker deal at Spanish Jim's saloon—I, see you've heard o' the place," he interpolated as Mrs. Wade drew back suddenly—"and when he couldn't clean 'em out in that way, or they showed a little more money than they played, he'd lay for 'em in a lone part o' the trail and go through them like any road agent. That's what he did that night—and that's how he got killed."

"How do you know this?" said Mrs. Wade with quivering lips.

"I was one o' the men he went through before he was killed. And I'd hev got my money back, but the rest o' the gang came up, and I got away jest in time to save my life and nothin' else. Ye might remember thar was one man got away and give the alarm, but he was goin' on to the States by the overland coach that night, and couldn't stay to be a witness. I was that man. I had paid my passage through and I couldn't lose that, too, with my other money, so I went."

Mrs. Wade sat stunned. She remembered the missing witness and how she had longed to see the man who was last with her husband; she remembered Spanish Jim's saloon—his well-known haunt; his frequent and unaccountable absences; the sudden influx of money which he always said he had won at cards; the diamond ring he had given her as the result of "a bet"; the forgotten recurrences of other robberies by a secret masked gang; a hundred other things that had worried her, instinctively, vaguely. She knew now, too, the meaning of the unrest that had driven her from Heavy Tree Hill—the strange unformulated fears that had haunted her even here. Yet with all this she felt, too, her present weakness—knew that this man had taken her at a disadvantage, that she ought to assert herself indignantly, deny everything—demand proof—and brand him a slanderer!

"How did—you—know it was my husband?" she stammered.

"His mask fell off in the fight; you know another mask was found; it was his. I saw him as plain as I see him there!" He pointed to a daguerreotype of her husband which stood upon her desk.

Mrs. Wade could only stare, vacantly, hopelessly. After a pause the man continued in a less aggressive manner and more confidential tone, which, however, only increased her terror: "I ain't sayin' that you knowed anything about this, ma'am, and whatever other folks might say when they know of it, I'll allers say that you didn't."

"What, then, do you come here for?" said the widow desperately.

"What do I come here for?" repeated the man grimly, looking around the room; "what did I come to this yer comfortable home—this yer big ranch and a rich woman like yourself for? Well, Mrs. Wade, I come to get the $600 your husband robbed me of, that's all! I ain't askin' more! I ain't askin' interest! I ain't askin' compensation for havin' to run for my life, and"—again looking grimly around the walls—"I ain't askin' more than you will give."

"But this house never was his—it was my father's," gasped Mrs. Wade; "you have no right——"

"Mebbe 'yes' and mebbe 'no,' Mrs. Wade," interrupted the man with a wave of his hat, "but how about them two drafts to bearer for two hundred dollars each, found among your husband's effects and collected by your lawyer for you—my drafts, Mrs. Wade!"

A wave of dreadful recollection overwhelmed her. She remembered the drafts found upon her husband's body, known only to her and her lawyer, and believed to be gambling gains, and collected at once under his legal advice.

"But you shall have to prove it—before witnesses."

"Do you want me to prove it before witnesses?" said the man, coming nearer. "Do you want to take my word and keep it between ourselves, or do you want to call in your superintendent and his men, and all Santa Ana, to hear me prove your husband was a highwayman, thief and murderer? Do you want to knock over that monument on Heavy Tree Hill, and upset your standing here among the deacons and elders? Do you want to do all this, and be forced, even by your neighbors, to pay me in the end as you will? Ef you do, call in your witnesses now and let's have it over."

He made a step toward the door, but she stopped him.

"No! No! Wait! It's a large sum—I haven't it with me," she stammered, thoroughly beaten.

"Ye kin get it."

"Give me time!" she implored. "Look! I'll give you a hundred down now—all I have here—the rest another time!" She nervously opened a drawer of her desk, and taking out a buckskin bag of gold thrust it in his hand. "There! Go away now!" She lifted her thin hand despairingly to her head. "Go! Do!"

The man seemed struck by her manner. "I don't want to be hard on a woman," he said slowly. "I'll go now and come back again at nine to-night. You can git the money—or what's as good, a check to bearer—by then. And ef ye'll take my advice you won't ask no advice from others, ef you want to keep your secret. Jest now it's safe with me; I'm a square man—ef I seem to be a hard one." He made a gesture as if to take her hand, but, as she drew shrinkingly away, he changed it to an awkward bow, and the next moment he was gone.

She started to her feet, but the unwonted strain upon her nerves and frail body had been greater than she knew. She made a step forward, felt the room whirl around her and then seem to collapse beneath her feet, and, clutching at her chair, sank back into it, fainting.

How long she lay there she never knew. She was at last conscious of some one bending over her, and a voice—the voice of Mr. Brooks—in her ear, saying: "I beg your pardon—you seem ill. Shall I call some one?"

"No!" she gasped, quickly recovering herself with an effort. "Where is—when did you come in?"

"Only this moment. I was leaving to-night, sooner than I expected, and thought I'd say good-by. They told me that you had been engaged with a stranger. I beg your pardon—I see you are ill. I won't detain you any longer."

"No! No! Don't go! I am better—better," she said feverishly. As she glanced at his strong and sympathetic face a wild idea seized her. He was a stranger here, an alien to these people, like herself. The advice that she dared not seek from others, from her half-estranged religious friends, from even her superintendent and his wife, dare she ask from him? Perhaps he saw this frightened doubt, this imploring appeal, in her eyes, for he said gently: "Is it anything I can do for you?"

"Yes," she said with the sudden desperation of weakness, "I want you to keep a secret!"

"Yours—yes!" he said promptly.

Whereat poor Mrs. Wade instantly burst into tears. Then amidst her sobs she told him of the stranger's visit, of his terrible accusations, of his demands—his expected return and her own utter helplessness. To her terror, as she went on she saw a singular change in his kind face; he was following her with hard, eager intensity. She had half hoped, even through her fateful instincts, that he might have laughed, manlike, at her fears. But he did not.

"You say he positively recognized your husband?"

"Yes, yes!" sobbed the widow, "and knew that photograph!" She pointed to the desk. Brooks turned quickly in that direction. Luckily his back was toward her, and she could not see his face nor the quick, startled look that came into his eyes. But when they again met hers it was gone, and even their eager intensity had changed to a gentle commiseration. "You have only his word for it, Mrs. Wade," he said gently, "and in telling your secret to another you have shorn the rascal of half his power over you, and he knew it. Now, dismiss the matter from your mind and leave it all to me. I will be here a few minutes before nine—and alone in this room. Let your visitor be shown in here—and don't let us be disturbed."

It lacked a few minutes of nine when Mr. Brooks was ushered into the sitting-room. As soon as he was alone he quietly examined the door and the windows and, having satisfied himself, took his seat in a chair casually placed behind the door. Presently he heard the sound of voices and a heavy footstep in the passage. He lightly felt his waistcoat pocket—it contained a pretty little weapon of power and precision, with a barrel scarcely two inches long.

The door opened and the person outside entered the room. In an instant Brooks had shut the door and locked it behind him. The man turned fiercely, but was faced by Brooks quietly—with one finger carelessly hooked in his waistcoat pocket. The man slightly recoiled from him, not so much from fear as from some vague stupefaction. "What's that for? What's your little game?" he said half contemptuously.

"No game at all," returned Brooks coolly. "You came here to sell a secret. I don't propose to have it given away first, to any listener."

"You don't—who are you?"

"That's a queer question to ask of the man you are trying to personate—but I don't wonder. You're doing it badly!"

"Personate—you?" said the stranger with staring eyes.

"Yes, me," said Brooks quietly. "I am the only man who escaped from the robbery that night at Heavy Tree Hill and who went home by the overland coach."

The stranger stared, but recovered himself with a coarse laugh. "Oh, well, we're on the same lay, it appears! Both after the widow—afore we show up her husband."

"Not exactly," said Brooks with his eyes fixed intently on the stranger. "You are here to denounce a highwayman who is dead and escaped justice. I am here to denounce one who is living! Stop! drop your hand, it's no use—you thought you had to deal only with a woman to-night and your revolver isn't quite handy enough. There! down! down! So! That'll do."

"You can't prove it," said the man hoarsely.

"Fool! In your story to that woman you have given yourself away. There were but two travelers attacked by the highwaymen. One was killed—I am the other. Where do you come in? What witness can you be except as the highwayman that you were? Who is left to identify Wade but you, his accomplice?"

The man's suddenly whitened face made his unshaven beard seem to bristle over his face like some wild animal's. "Well, ef you kalkilate to blow me, you've got to blow Wade and his widder, too," he said whiningly.

"I've thought of that," said Brooks coolly, "and I calculate that to prevent it is worth about that hundred dollars you got from that poor woman—and no more! Now sit down at that table and write as I dictate."

The man looked at him in wonder, but obeyed.

"Write," said Brooks, "I hereby certify that my accusations against the late Pulaski Wade, of Heavy Tree Hill, are erroneous and groundless, and the result of mistaken identity, especially in regard to any complicity of his in the robbery of John Stubbs, deceased, and Henry Brooks, at Heavy Tree Hill on the night of the thirteenth of August, 1854."

The man looked up with a repulsive smile. "Who's the fool now? What's become of your hold on the widder now?"

"Write!" said Brooks fiercely.

The sound of a pen hurriedly scratching paper followed this first outburst of the quiet Brooks. "Sign it," said Brooks. The man signed it.

"Now go," said Brooks, unlocking the door, "but remember, if you should ever be inclined to revisit Santa Ana you will find me living here also."

The man slunk out of the door and into the passage like a wild animal returning to the night and darkness. Brooks took up the paper, rejoined Mrs. Wade in the parlor and laid it before her.

"But," said the widow, trembling even in her joy, "do you—do you think he was really mistaken?"

"Positive," said Brooks coolly. "It's true it's a mistake that has cost you a hundred dollars—but there are some mistakes that are worth that to be kept quiet."

They were married a year later, but there is no record that in after years of conjugal relations with a weak, charming woman, Henry Brooks was ever tempted to tell her the whole truth of the robbery of Heavy Tree Hill.

Tales of the Credit Man

By Harlow N. Higinbotham

1—PREPARATION AND QUALIFICATIONS

A MAN may write credits for half a lifetime and not be a credit man. It sounds trite to say that the real credit man is born, not made; but this phrase seems to apply with greater fitness and truth to this member of the executive staff of the modern wholesale establishment than to any other of its departmental heads. Why this is so will easily be seen by a little examination into the qualifications which afford the best equipment for the peculiar responsibilities of the credit desk.

Most important of all, he must be a temperate man—and I use the word in its broadest, its dispositional sense. He must not only maintain the appearance of a calm and equable temperament, but this must be in fact his mental attitude and condition. For a credit man to become excited would be as incongruous and unpardonable as for a judge on the bench to give place to a display of passion or temper. His every act should be judicial, analytical and far removed from passion or prejudice. Then he must be gifted with a talent for affairs—a "nose for business," as the good editor or reporter has a "nose for news." This quality is more intuitive than logical in its operation, and may well be classed as a gift of Nature rather than one of the ordinary faculties of reason.

Now, as to the artificial acquirements, the study, training and experience which give the man who is about to take up the duties of the credit desk the best possible preparation for the exacting demands of the position: I am profoundly convinced that the credit man who has not lived on a farm or in a country village must always be at a distinct disadvantage in his work. No amount of native shrewdness can make up for the lack of an intimate, first-hand knowledge of all the conditions which affect the prosperity of the farmer and the rural community. The ideal basis of experience upon which to build a good credit man is a boyhood on a farm, a few years in the typical "general store" of the average village, a period of service in the country bank and a thorough drill in the cashier's department of the wholesale house. The young man who comes to the credit desk with this kind of experience behind him has the best schooling for the place that he could possibly possess.

The Ideal School for the Future Credit Man

Why place so much stress on this country training? Why insist that no credit man who has not lived on a farm may reasonably hope to come up to the full stature of the ideal credit man? Generally speaking, each customer of the wholesale dealer is his distributing agent in the centre of a circle of farmers. The latter may be spoken of as the final customers, for all trade must, sooner or later, get back to them for a basis—and this step is ordinarily shorter and more direct than is commonly supposed. Whatever affects the farmer affects the retail merchant and makes his prosperity or his adversity, and the credit man's task is simply that of accurately forecasting the financial condition of the country merchant. If the retail tradesman is dependent for his prosperity upon that of the farmer, it is plain to see that a knowledge of all that makes good or bad times for the farmer is the elemental thing in the calculations of the credit man. If he knows the climatic conditions which have prevailed in certain localities during the crop-growing season he does not need to have his customer come to the city to tell him how trade and collections have been. No matter how bright, shrewd and sound may be the country merchant, he cannot prosper without trade and its harvest of collected profits, and when the weather in any locality has been against the farmers the credit man knows that he must watch the account of the merchant from that locality a little more carefully than he would if the farmers there were enjoying the best of conditions.

If he can form a first-hand judgment of the "prospects" of any customer, uncolored by the views or arguments of the latter, he is able to determine how much credit to extend to the country merchant, how large a stock of goods the tradesman should carry, when to be lenient with him and when not. Here is a case in point:

How the Credit Man Uses His Sixth Sense

A country merchant, apparently above the average in prosperity, came to me and asked for a large credit. No sooner did he name the town from which he came than I had a fair idea of the possible extent of his trade under the most advantageous circumstances, for I knew the population of the town, the extent of farming territory from which he might hope to draw trade, and the general productiveness of the locality. Then came a few casual inquiries about the kind of weather that had prevailed in his region, and I had a survey of his business situation and prospects which was far more comprehensive and exact than he suspected. The line of credit which he wished to establish was large enough for a merchant leading the trade in a community five times the size of that in which he was located. Consequently, instead of receiving the liberal credit for which he asked, he was given a limit of $1000. Of course, he did not like this, and at the time my decision might have seemed a little arbitrary, as I had no reason to believe he was not an honest man. But I knew he did not need to buy the big stock of goods he wished to start out with, as the possible volume of trade at his command would not warrant so heavy an investment. An Eastern jobbing house, however, did not take this view of the country merchant's situation, and trusted him to the extent of more than $50,000. Very likely the credit man of that establishment had never done any actual farming and had not served an apprenticeship in a country store or bank. Certainly he demonstrated that he was utterly unable to form any idea of the trade capacity of a farming community. The merchant who had thus secured from the Eastern house an enormous quantity of goods disposed of the major part of them by the most expeditious methods possible and then made his escape to Canada with the proceeds.

Though agriculture is the basis of business in this country, and though I think it of greater advantage to the young credit man to understand by experience the life of a farming district rather than of any other kind of industrial community, I do not wish to place an absurd or exaggerated value on this point of rural experience. Rather let the emphasis rest on this statement: Get a clear and intelligent idea of the environments of each customer, whether he lives in a dairy, a mining, a lumbering, a stock-raising or a manufacturing community. This will enable you to form an independent and unprejudiced idea of the situation.

How to Study Business Law

Next in the list of acquirements which the young credit man must have to make him successful is a good, practical familiarity with accounts and a sound knowledge of commercial law. The first he may obtain at the bookkeeping desk of the country store, in the village bank or, perhaps, in the commercial school. Though I hold that actual experience is the best school for an accountant, I am not prejudiced against the commercial school, for the reason that a certain amount of scientific or, if you please, theoretical knowledge is necessary in the making of a good accountant—one who is able to start a set of books or reorganize a set which has been incompetently handled. A man may post a set of accounts for thirty years, following blindly an established routine, without understanding the first principles of accounting. Therefore, a fair grounding in the theory of bookkeeping enforced by actual experience is by far the best training in this direction.

One line of preparation which no young credit man can afford to neglect is that of commercial law. The occasions on which this kind of information is most needed generally arise unexpectedly and suddenly. There is no opportunity for leisurely consultation of legal authorities. Action must be taken immediately. How may the young man ground himself in this branch of the credit business so that he will not, through ignorance or misunderstanding of the law, plunge his house into an expensive mistake? Attendance upon a course of lectures on the fundamentals of commercial law, delivered by a plain, practical, common-sense lawyer, is probably the most convenient way in which to get a good grounding in this branch of legal knowledge. This is easily to be had in any well-equipped law or business college. If this means of information is not available, and if he does not already know an able and experienced commercial lawyer, let him make the acquaintance of such an attorney, and cultivate the acquaintance into a friendship so intimate that the professional man will gladly answer his questions by the hour. If the lawyer is inclined to illustrate each legal point with a good story or anecdote, so much the better, for nothing so fixes a principle in the memory as does a good story.

Of course the young credit man may put in his evenings reading commercial law, if he has the application and energy to do this in a systematic way, but the individual so gifted is rare. He will start into the reading with colors flying, but will drop out of the dreary pursuit as soon as its "deadly monotony" is fully realized. By far the better way is to absorb the legal knowledge from a lawyer who is gifted with sound common-sense and has had experience in commercial litigation.

Whenever some problem in commercial law is suggested by the experiences of the day, let this be carefully considered and finally proposed to the lawyer. To be sure that none of these problems is forgotten, keep a written memorandum of each hypothetical case, making its statement clear and exact. It will be well for the young man to record his own unaided conclusions in each case before submitting the problem to his counselor. This practice will tend to show the soundness of his individual judgment in matters of commercial law, and also will impress the whole bearings of the case upon his recollection. Of course the epitome of the lawyer's decision should be placed on record. Almost unconsciously he will be continually alert to see to what extent the conclusions of his friendly legal adviser are verified in the stern test of actual experience. Until the future credit man is actually a part of the credit department he cannot put in his best efforts at learning the wisdom of the credit desk. His first year or two of active service in the department of credits must "make or break" his future record in the greater number of instances. This must be the time of his hard training, of his seasoning, when his theories are demonstrated under the severe pressure of responsibility. Then it is that the general knowledge of accounts and of commercial law, which he has picked up in the cashier's department and previously in the country bank or store, is applied under the stress of the hurry and push which is as much a feature of the modern counting-room as of the salesroom or factory. In some sudden exigency the advice of his lawyer friend flashes into his mind. Instantly he concludes, "That man was right!" and his line of action is quickly determined.

The Necessity for Diplomatic Letter-Writing

Letter-writing is a branch of credit work to which altogether too little attention is paid. No matter how shrewd a judge of character any credit man may be, he labors under a serious and dangerous handicap unless he becomes an adroit letter-writer. When it is remembered that, as a general thing, the credit man must be regarded as the monitor of the establishment, and that the merchant who never has occasion to exchange a letter with him or to call at his desk is most to be congratulated, it will be seen that the relationship is a peculiarly sensitive one. As a rule, each letter written by the credit man means a favor granted or denied, a reminder of unfulfilled obligations or a rebuke administered. The letters from the credit man which are not particularly welcome are considerably in excess of those which grant all that has been asked; therefore the situation resolves itself into a constant study of how so to word an unpleasant letter that it may be effective and still not give serious offense. Scores of credit men are able to exercise sound diplomacy in handling a delicate situation when face to face with the customer, who fail utterly when it comes to stating the situation on paper. In employing the agency of correspondence they lose their facility and accuracy of expression, and are either so concise that their correspondents think them cold and curt, or they are so profuse that the country merchant sees in the multiplicity of words a betrayal of indecision, of timidity or lack of directness, dignity and force. If a young man does not know how to write letters he may learn—and to this task he should apply himself with energy and patience, realizing that the importance of the result aimed at is an ample justification of severe and continued effort.

MR. HARLOW H. HIGINBOTHAM

The art of saying no in a manner so gracious that the person who receives the denial does not feel aggrieved, and is inclined cheerfully to grant its justice, is nowhere so constantly in demand as at the credit desk. There the frequency of informing a customer that his request for an extension of time or for an increase of his credit must be denied depends only upon the size of the business. In a large house it is an hourly routine. Then the matter becomes even more sensitive when the house is compelled to call the customer's attention to the fact that he is crowding his limit, that he is behind in his payments, that, in one of a possible score of particulars, his relationship is not quite satisfactory. The tone of every letter should be pitched with nicety and in harmony with the credit man's knowledge of his customer's character and with the effect it is desired to produce.

Each epistle demands its own individual adjustment so that it may "wing" without killing the bird, for it must be remembered that the general object of the credit man's epistolary efforts is to hold the customers of the house in safe lines and to educate them into sounder business methods, so that he may rely upon them with greater certainty for prompt payments—and for larger payments, too. The credit man who writes his letters as if his function were to get the money due from a customer in such a manner that the latter could not, with self-respect, continue to trade with the house, is not entirely an unknown species, but he should be.

The Credit Man's Perplexities

There is a general impression that the credit man must be remarkably proficient as an accountant and as a mathematician—a "lightning calculator," as it were. While he must have a good, firm grasp of the principles and practice of accounting, he will generally injure instead of help his chances by displaying the powers of a mathematical prodigy.

A gift for judging men is, of course, the basis of the credit man's equipment. Without this peculiar knack of insight he is certain to make shipwreck of his career, if he does not of his house. Sometimes the statement of a prospective customer and all the information obtained from other and presumably impartial and reliable sources go to indicate that the merchant is worth all the credit for which he asks. At the same time the man at the credit desk has a feeling—perhaps rather vague and indefinable—that the man is not what he claims and that his request for credit should be denied. This brings the young credit man face to face with a difficult and perplexing situation. The first time he confronts a condition of this kind he may well pause and ask which is the safer guide to follow, intuition or reason.

Confidence in Intuition Not Misplaced

Speaking from individual experience I would say, act upon the intuition, for if the case were analyzed thoroughly it would be found that the intuition is but the impression gained from a kind of subconscious reasoning. I recall one time when I was confronted by a situation of the kind I have described. A man from one of the large towns in a Western farming State came and asked for a considerable credit. He stated that he had $75,000 capital. This was a large amount for such a place. By a few questions, which he answered without hesitation and apparently without reserve, I gained the information that quite a large share of this fortune was lent in Chicago on collateral security and brought interest at the rate of three per cent. to five per cent. a month. He told how extensive a line of credit he was able to command from other houses, and also gave the name of the man who attended to his loan business in Chicago. The latter verified all the claims of our prospective customer, and when the latter's name was mentioned to the credit man of a neighboring house it drew out the remark, "We'll trust him for $20,000." In the face of such corroboration and indorsement I said:

"You must pay cash before we ship you any goods whatever." Shortly afterward the papers contained sensational accounts of the sudden disappearance of this provincial "merchant prince." He sold his goods for less than their cost and made good his escape across the Canadian border.

The Road to the Credit Desk

As I have intimated, the natural road to the credit desk is by way of the cashier's department. There the young man handles the correspondence and quickly learns the names of customers and of their towns. What is still more important, he becomes familiar with their business characteristics and habits. If Smith, of Smithville, is inclined to remit a few days over time, and if Jones, of Jonesboro, is in the habit of overreaching the strict limits in taking his discount, the accountants in the cashier's office acquire this information in the routine discharge of their duties. This is not only valuable but necessary information to an assistant credit man.

There is little room for advice on the relationship of the young credit man with the head of the house, or with the dominant personality of the establishment, as the nature of this relationship must depend so largely upon the character of the man. If he is a broad, progressive, modern man of affairs he will simply define a general policy for the credit department and refuse to be consulted upon the details of its execution, save in cases of the utmost importance. The only way by which the young credit man may cultivate the confidence and esteem of such a man is to do his work so well that the results will speak his praises. It is equally certain that the only way in which to develop a credit man is to push him out on his resources, where he must act on his own judgment and act quickly. Any other line of treatment is certain to destroy the stamina and independence of the credit man, who must be the backbone of the house in the way of often sacrificing what seems to be a "bird in the hand"—the account of a promising customer—for the remote fear of future disaster. The credit man needs all the stamina he can develop, and the cultivation of this quality should be encouraged instead of hindered.

The Credit Man's Relations with the House

There is also another excellent reason why the credit man should be firmly established in the attitude of independent and responsible action, without feeling any necessity for consultation with his superior. The more solid and desirable the customer the more sensitive is he to anything which he may construe as a reflection upon his financial standing. Let us suppose that a merchant of this kind goes into a wholesale house where the credit man feels that he cannot take a single important step without consulting higher authority. He offers his statement and makes a showing which, he is proudly conscious, is above question or reproach and entitles him to instant welcome among the best patrons of the house. This is what he expects, and when the credit man asks to be excused for a moment and goes to the private office of the proprietor for consultation, the customer instantly interprets the hesitation to grant him the line of credit asked as a challenge to the record he has offered. Probably he recalls very distinctly that he did not have to wait in the office of the competing house while the credit man submitted his case to the proprietor, but that he received all he asked without question or delay.

The credit man who is not given the full authority of his position has not an enviable task. It will be doubly wearing and irksome if he has interference and timidity to deal with in the very quarter from which his support should come. The word support is used advisedly, for the credit man soon finds that he stands between the selling department and the vested interests of the house. Salesmen are anxious to sell, and often feel that a ruling of the credit man is too conservative, and works a direct hardship to them in cutting down their sales, driving away customers, and consequently curtailing their profits. On the other hand, he is forcibly reminded of the other side of his problem when a customer with a big credit line goes to the wall or to Canada, and thousands of dollars go with him. It is the delicate and difficult mission of the credit man to minimize this friction between the selling and the proprietary interests of the establishment, to hold all the good customers firmly in line, to coax or prod the lagging into step with the prompt ones, and to keep the worthless out of the ranks altogether.

These views are offered simply as the conclusions of one credit man based upon his personal experience, and if their expression seems didactic it is his misfortune, for they are not so intended. Let them be accepted, therefore, as the personal opinions of one who does not assume to speak with authority, but is willing to give to those engaged in this line of work the benefit of a frank statement of the problems which have come to him and of the conclusions and impressions they have left with him.

MEN AND WOMEN of the HOUR

A Legion of Partners

Probably no business man in the United States has had a more varied career than W. J. White, who has recently been made president of the American Chicle Company, the newly formed consolidation of all the chewing-gum interests in the country. An orphan boy, raised on a farm, his first business venture was the sale of apples at the county fair, when he was a lad of fourteen years. Later he was cook for a gang of railroad builders in Kansas, and when he lost his job he "tramped" back East. The next turn of fortune found him a peddler of candy on the streets of one of the big cities.

When Mr. White first attempted to launch a new chewing gum on the market he met with failure after failure in his effort to interest capital.

He once offered to a man an interest in the establishment for $1000. From this incident has grown the claim made by a thousand and one nobodies that they might have been partners of the wealthy manufacturer. Nothing so arouses Mr. White's ire as a fraudulent contention of this character. On one occasion he was seated in a hotel dining-room and heard a young man at the adjoining table relating to his companion how he might have been as fortunate as the chewing-gum manufacturer if he had but yielded to the entreaties of Mr. White. The president of the consolidation stood it as long as he could, and then walking over to the table he explained that he was W. J. White, and confessed that he had entirely forgotten ever making such an offer as that which he had just heard recounted.

Hamlin Garland's Pluck

Few writers have the splendid physique possessed by Hamlin Garland, whose courage is equal to his muscle. In his recent pilgrimage to the Klondike over the new Canadian trail he deliberately exposed himself to dangers from which veteran prospectors and mountaineers were disposed to shrink, but he confesses that he was once so thoroughly scared that his heart pounded like a steam trip-hammer. This was when he was "looking for color" in the Cripple Creek country.

Learning that he could reach the largest ranch of that region in time to witness the grand round-up, he set out in post-haste on the back of a piebald bronco for which he conceived a decided liking. When he reached the ranch his bronco was turned into the immense corral, into which had already been driven a hundred or more head of cattle.

After a night's rest he went out with his bridle on his arm to "get up" his bronco. In his boyhood he had "punched cows" on the prairies, and knew that a man on foot is a natural target for horns of a drove of Western cattle. One glance at the situation told him that it was a risky thing to venture into the corral, but he felt that his standing with the cowboys would be irretrievably lost if he were to retreat.

The moment he entered the corral he was sighted by an enormous bull, the king of the herd. Instantly this monarch of the range threw up his head and gave a ferocious snort. Shrewdly calculating that the bull would indulge in a slight theatrical prelude before leading the onslaught of the herd, Mr. Garland made his way rapidly toward his bronco. Before he reached the animal's side, however, he heard a terrific bellow and saw a cloud of dust where his enemy was pawing the dirt. Then the whole herd bore down upon him.

When the charge of broad horns was only a few rods away the apostle of Western realism reached his pony, grabbed its short mane and leaped upon the creature's back. Instantly the attacking force came to a halt, sniffed the air and looked about in astonishment and confusion, unable to account for the sudden disappearance of the intended victim of the charge. A horse with a rider was a thing familiar and to be respected by the fiercest bull; but a man without a horse was an alien and an intruder.

A Convention on the Philadelphia Plan

One of the famous dining organizations is the Gridiron Club, of Washington. Its dinners are celebrated in all parts of the world. There are men who will travel thousands of miles to be present at one of the feasts. It is new and lively from start to finish, and every great man not only of the United States, but every one who has visited this country has enjoyed its hospitality. The club is composed of forty of the best-known newspaper correspondents at Washington. The dinners are given monthly and each has its special burlesque. The one given the other night, for instance, was the Convention Dinner and was a huge take-off on Presidential gatherings. The chief Democrats and the chief Republicans were there, Chairman Hanna and Chairman Jones and a majority of the Cabinet and many of the leading Democrats all being present. The president of the club is Henry Litchfield West, who probably knows more politicians than any journalist in the United States. Mr. West has a serious manner which inspires confidence, and his voice is deeply solemn. His speeches are indescribable in their effectiveness. At this particular dinner he announced, as if he were calling the roll or doing some other unemotional thing, that all the details, such as the selection of temporary and permanent officers, the appointment of committees and the nomination of the ticket and so on, had been arranged beforehand.

"Then what kind of a convention is this?" asked a member of the club.

President West gazed at Senator Hanna. "A convention on the Philadelphia plan," he replied. "The delegates have nothing to do but furnish the enthusiasm."

General Gordon's Gifted Daughter

Miss Caroline Gordon, of Georgia, daughter of John B. Gordon, ex-Governor, ex-Senator and famous Confederate soldier, will give public readings of Southern folk-lore and anecdotes of plantation life. The late Mr. Frank Thomson, President of the Pennsylvania Railroad, put this idea in her head. He considered her one of the most brilliant story-tellers among women. He promised her anything to make her career successful if she would give such entertainments as he proposed. His house near Philadelphia entertained more distinguished men of this country and Europe than any other house in Pennsylvania. It was at a dinner of brilliant personages that Mr. Thomson launched Miss Gordon into public story-telling. She was the guest of his daughter, and had delighted her host for days in succession with her remarkable narrative gift, her folk-songs and her imitation of plantation cake-walks—not the absurd thing one sees in the North, when a prize is offered, but the genuine thing in front of the cabins, to the light of torches.

Mr. Thomson told Miss Gordon that she must tell her best story at this dinner party. She tried to beg off, but finally consented if they could arrange a tactful method of bringing the story into play. She rehearsed her story and he decided upon the method of bringing it up. He would guide the talk to shop and mention some experiments with locomotives the road had recently been making.

"Speaking of locomotives," Miss Gordon was to say, and then launch out on her best anecdote, which was about a train. The plan succeeded perfectly, but Miss Gordon confessed that she nearly had hysterics when she caught the twitching of her host's mouth, and the symptoms of choking in his daughter as the cue was given.

Hugh J. Grant's Rise

Most of the success of Hugh J. Grant, the recent receiver for the Third Avenue Railroad and twice Mayor of New York, is popularly supposed to start from his honesty in refusing to vote with the "Boodle" aldermen, in 1884, for the Broadway railroad franchise, a transaction which landed several of the lawmakers in prison and sent many others to Canada as exiles. From this time on Alderman Grant's progress was Napoleonic. He was Sheriff and Mayor, being four times the candidate of his party for the latter office.

But Mr. Grant made his beginning long before that. When he was little over twenty years old he determined to make a place in local politics. He chose three lieutenants, all of them rich and prominent now, and made an assault on the Tammany forces in the old Nineteenth District, which took in all the upper Westside of New York. At the primary election the Grant men were clubbed by the police and hustled about by the ward heelers, but they climbed over their heads as if scaling a wall, and deposited their ballots safely. They were beaten, however, but the next year opposition shifted and they carried the district. Soon after that Mr. Grant became an alderman.

When the great dinner was given to President Harrison and the Cabinet during the Washington Centennial in 1889, Mr. Grant was Mayor. He had been chiefly known before that as an honest and active politician who had inherited a fortune and was making another. At this dinner, which was engineered by the leaders of New York's four hundred and was attended by the pick of the big men of the nation and the chief members of the diplomatic corps, steps were taken to prevent Mayor Grant from presiding. It was thought that he would mar the function by ignorance and uncouthness. But the Mayor was firm, and he not only presided, but he established a reputation as a model and graceful toastmaster, and in his own address he captured the heartiest applause of the evening, a large part of which came from the very men who had opposed him at the beginning.

Miss Brown and the Gypsy

An adventure in Warwickshire, England, which Miss Alice Brown has not recorded in her recent volume, By Oak and Thorn, is thus related by a friend of hers:

"Of course you know that By Oak and Thorn is a story of pilgrimages through rural England. It was toward the close of a day devoted to a long tramp that Miss Brown and her companions came to a gypsy camp by the roadside.

"A gypsy girl came forward and, in wheedling tones, begged permission to tell their fortunes. Miss Brown has a strong element of the Puritan in her character, and she objected to encouraging what she regarded as pure humbug, but, at last, good-naturedly yielded.

"The gypsy took her hand and, after the usual flattery and promise of a wealthy and handsome husband, looking long and earnestly into Miss Brown's eyes the while, suddenly began a really remarkable chronicle of Miss Brown's past. The sibyl not only announced such, perhaps, discernible facts as that Miss Brown's nationality was American, and that she was a writer, but went into particulars of her life in America that really astonished, so accurate were they.

"Miss Brown said afterward that the only way she could explain it was by telepathy—that she was fatigued herself, and her mind had been dwelling on pictures of her home life—but it was her first experience of the kind, and she believed it would be her last. She had no more faith than before in the possibility of a human mind predicting the future accurately."

"PUBLICK OCCURRENCES"

Checks Great and Small

A few days ago Honorable Ellis H. Roberts, the Treasurer of the United States, signed two checks, one for two cents and the other for $137,594,653.15. The same routine was necessary for each. The two-cent check gave just as much trouble in the clerical routine of the office as the check for millions. This wide difference illustrates the wonderful variety of the financial operations of the National Government. Nominally the revenues of this country are $650,000,000 a year, but in handling this almost incredible sum the transaction reached several billions of dollars. Uncle Sam not only collects an enormous amount of money, but he pays it out in many thousand different ways, and every cent expended goes through a labyrinth of red tape, which, though tortuous and complicated, is a necessary safeguard for the money of the people.

We do not hear much of the Treasurer of the United States in the news and discussions of the day, but, after all, he is one of the most important officers of the Government. He is custodian of all the moneys and of the securities pledged by the national banks for their circulating notes and for public moneys deposited with them. There are sub-treasurers in nine cities and all these are under his order. With the Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller he signs all warrants for payments and with the Register all checks for transfers of moneys from any depositories. He pays by checks interest on registered public securities and redeems national banknotes and worn Government currency. Upon his suggestion are determined the denominations of United States paper printed for circulation, and this is the man who has to be as careful about two cents as about one hundred millions of dollars.

The Legal Money for Paying Debts

Every hour of the day we use money in one form or another, either earning it, spending it or changing it, and yet how few of us really understand the actual value of the notes and coins that we receive or distribute. What is legal tender? Do you pause to consider the fact that about one-half of the money of the United States is really not legal in the matter of paying a debt?

Legal tender is familiar in the discussion of politics, and it is one of those things which we hear much about and which we very inadequately understand. Legal tender currency means that it is money which can be lawfully used in paying a debt.

Of course, all the money of the United States is accepted for any indebtedness, but as a matter of fact much of it is not really legal tender. For instance, gold certificates are not legal tender; silver certificates are not legal tender; trade dollars are not legal tender; fractional currency is not a legal tender; foreign gold coins and foreign silver coins are not legal tenders. There is even a question as to the old Continental currency, although the States, with the exception of Rhode Island, passed a law in favor of it, while the Continental Congress decided that any man who refused to take this money should be deemed an enemy of his country.

The legal tenders under the present laws are eleven in number and they are so determined under this definition, which is taken from Bouvier's Law Dictionary:

"Money of a character which by law a debtor may require his creditor to receive in payment in the absence of any agreement in the contract or obligation itself."

These are gold coins, standard silver dollars, subsidiary silver coin—the silver coins of the United States of smaller denominations than one dollar are a legal tender in all sums not exceeding ten dollars—copper, bronze and copper nickel coin, United States notes—known as greenbacks—demand treasury notes, the one and two year notes of 1863, the compound interest notes of the sixties, the treasury notes of 1890, the Columbian half dollars and the Columbian quarters. In actual business, needless to say, the question of legal tender is not often raised.

A Look at Uncle Sam's Books

It is a very curious fact that the taxpayers of the country, as a rule, are ignorant of the way in which they are taxed and of the direction in which the taxes go. You who are reading this may be an average or a special citizen, but if you were asked about the details of the Government finances you would probably be unable to answer.

For instance, in the first place you should explain that this country, in addition to its other innovations, has discovered and put into operation a system of taxation which gets the money without the person who pays it knowing it. There was a time, beginning in 1862 and ending in 1888, when a part of the revenue to sustain the Government was raised by direct taxes. But even then the sum was a very small one compared to the amount required for the support of the Government.

The recent war tax is almost direct, but it is peculiar that our modern mechanical developments have increased our blindness to facts. That is to say, while this tax is direct the stamps are so conveniently furnished on our blank checks that we do not feel the burden of it. At the same time it exists.

Another thing about our finances is the variation that has existed since the beginning of the Government. Of course it is not necessary to go back to the beginning of the century because the contrast would not be valuable, but suppose we take 1860 and compare it with 1900, a period of forty years. In 1860 the Government was supported entirely from the customs—the receipts being a little over fifty-three million dollars—and from the sale of public lands, the receipts being $1,778,000, and miscellaneous resources, bringing the total to $56,064,607.83, and in that year the Government spent over $7,000,000 more than it received.

It is impossible to say exactly how much the Government will receive this year, but it will be somewhere between six and seven hundred million dollars. Of this amount the largest sum will come from internal revenue, the next largest from customs, and then there will be miscellaneous items running up to thirty or forty million dollars, which will swell the total to the amount necessary to run the machinery of Government.

How will this be spent? In 1860 the War Department cost $16,409,767.10. In 1897 the cost was $48,950,267.89; in 1898 it was $91,992,000.29; in 1899 it was $229,841,254.47. This year it will be a very large sum again, which goes to show how much war and expansion cost. In 1860 the Navy cost exactly $11,514,964.96. This year the naval appropriation bill is over $63,000,000. The civil and miscellaneous establishments of the country will cost us this year about $120,000,000. We have done our best to make the Indians good angels, but in spite of all our efforts the cost of the work has increased from $2,949,191.34 in 1860, to over $12,000,000 in 1890. In the matter of pensions the growth has been something almost incredible. In 1860 it was a little over a million dollars. Now it is almost $150,000,000 a year—another illustration of the cost of war. The interest on the public debt in 1860 was about $3,000,000; now it is nearly $40,000,000.

In 1860 the total expenditures were about sixty-three millions of dollars; now they are ten times that sum. So when we speak of expansion spreading over the face of the earth we may congratulate ourselves that we have expanded somewhat at home.

Our $10,000 Notes

The other day when one of the rascals who had been stealing from the postal revenues in Cuba was caught, and was held in $20,000 bail, two crisp ten thousand dollar notes were sent by the bank, in which he was a depositor, to the court. The incident attracted considerable attention from the fact that ten thousand dollar notes are not familiar to the general public. Indeed, few people know that they are in circulation, yet the figures of the Treasury, as sent in the latest statement to THE SATURDAY EVENING POST from Washington, show that there are six thousand of them outstanding at the present time, all of them, with few exceptions, being gold certificates. There are five thousand $5000 notes and there are over seventy-five thousand $1000 notes, or to make the matter more interesting, suppose we take the table as kindly furnished by Secretary Gage:

One dollar	$ 59,607,532
Two dollars	37,686,259
Five dollars	298,621,215
Ten dollars	352,873,112
Twenty dollars	279,361,366
Fifty dollars	65,529,965
One hundred dollars	78,984,070
Five hundred dollars	21,074,500
One thousand dollars	75,908,500
Five thousand dollars	25,855,000
Ten thousand dollars	58,030,000
Fractional parts	32,642

NOTE—Currency Certificates issued under Act of June 8, 1872, and representing United States notes deposited in the Treasury, $7,470,000.

This table, however, does not show the entire amount of money in circulation. There are coins in addition to the bills, and the total amount, counting everything, is considerably over two billions of dollars. The exact sum as supplied from the Treasury Department in one of its late reports is $2,323,042,973. The population of the United States as calculated by the Treasury Department was then estimated at 77,535,000, so that the circulation of money per capita was $26.58.

The Struggle for Treasury Offices

The Custom House and the Revenue Office collect and Congress appropriates. Few people understand the great battle, or rather the series of battles, which takes place in every meeting of the National Legislature. There are thousands of interests which fight for their own profits, and the Congressmen are pulled hither and where in the contest of diplomacy. It is a matter of competition all the way through. Applicants fight one another, Congressmen fight the applicants, and finally comes the great battle between the House and the Senate, both of which are jealous to the extreme of their rights and precedents.

The Cost of Being Governed

The other day the statement was made that the United States Government was rapidly approaching a record of two millions a day. The figures of the Congress which has recently adjourned more than bear this out. It is almost impossible to explain just what this means, but it shows the tremendous operations of a great government. In all big plants machinery costs, and there is nothing so expensive as the machinery of politics. People are usually extravagant when handling other people's money. Receivers exact big fees; Congressmen try to get the highest possible appropriation, even for alleged rivers which run dry, according to "Sunset" Cox, when you bore a hole in the earth.

The Diary of a New Congressman's Wife

COUSIN MELINDA has packed up her trunks ready for a start for Spruce City, and the hot weather has made me think of cool sylvan glades and rippling streams and has made everything Congressional long and plan for speedy adjournment.

The most remarkable change seems to have taken place in the appearance of Congress. I was up there one Monday, not long since, and in more ways than one this change was noticeable, and as I glanced around I was sure that "variety of mere nothings gives more pleasure than uniformity of something," for the variety and styles of dress among Senators and Representatives in their vain effort for coolness and dignity combined convinced me that they had made it a principal rule of life not to be too much addicted to any one thing.

First and foremost, about two weeks ago, before old Sol had climbed quite so high, the surest harbinger that summer was upon us was the Congressional white vest which made its appearance. As soon as one man had worn this hot-weather badge others donned a like raiment, until Messrs. Hanna, Hale, Lodge, Elkins, Daniel and a host of others were tricked out thus. The next step in the stripping of Senatorial dignity was when man after man discarded his long frock coat and appeared in every conceivable cut and style of go-as-you-please sack coat of abbreviated dimensions. Then old Sol suddenly, as though he had winked one eye at this concession, climbed a peg higher and Senatorial dignity stepped down a peg lower, and lo! the waistcoat was discarded.

When a Senator discards that garment he feels that he has in truth parted with his last attribute of solemn grandeur and goes about much as the little old woman in Mother Goose, who had her skirts cut off on the King's highway and did not know herself, but was consoled with the reflection that "if this be I, as I suppose it be, then I have a little dog at home and he'll know me." Several Senators secretly stripped off their waistcoats and went around with their coats buttoned up, in the fond notion that nobody guessed their secret.

Senator Wolcott boldly defied Senatorial tradition, and the public, too, by appearing in a brilliant shirt of gamboge tint with his coat flapping wide open. This shirt would have outrivaled the hues of a Turner sunset, and during the first hour or two of his presence in this costume he wore his yellow-red shirt with all the dash and aplomb of a knight tilting at the ring, but gradually, whether the eyes of the gallery or the sly allusions of his colleagues were too much for him, he buttoned up his coat and subsided behind his desk. But he need not have become so bashful all of a sudden, for did not Mr. Foraker run him closely in a shirt covered over with bright spots which resembled a thick sprinkling of currants on a shiny bun? And Senator Jones, of Arkansas, the embodiment of Senatorial dignity, stalked about in a waistcoat and long, square coat of linen crash. As for Senator Sullivan, he was the attraction of the whole gallery. On one of the warmest days he appeared in a gorgeous summer suit of lightest shade, with the frock coat cut with the fullest and longest skirts I have ever seen on any one but a woman, and when he sat down these skirts had to be carefully gathered up by both hands and disposed of in his lap, which one of our newspapers very funnily described as giving him "the appearance of an old woman with a lap full of sewing."

No one praises Washington more enthusiastically than a certain new Congressman from New York. "Everybody is good-looking here," he said the other day. "Everybody has leisure and is never in a hurry. This is the only city where everybody takes off his hat when a woman enters an elevator, and where men give up their seats to women in the street cars, and the conductor remembers where you want to get off. Policemen are polite and are not globular in form, as they are in New York. The saloons close at twelve o'clock and the astonishing thing is that they actually do close with no side light left burning. And one altogether delightful thing is that with the coming of summer the women go about hatless. Unhatted they ride in electric cars, on bicycles, in carriages and automobiles, and the summer get-up of men is funny, comfortable and not altogether unbecoming. I actually saw a fellow wearing a short frock coat of white flannel, with flannel trousers to match, brilliant shirt and bright-hued golf-stockings and a straw hat with a multi-colored hatband, and——"

"Oh," I interrupted, laughing, "you must have seen the new third Secretary of one of the Legations; that sounds like one of his costumes. He has come over here, bringing twenty-two trunks, and he is evidently going to let the beauty of his wardrobe gradually unfold itself like a flower. Why, this man's clothes are the talk of the town. He appeared on the golf links at Chevy Chase the other day in two different golf suits, one for morning wear and one, a veritable creation, for afternoon, and no other diplomat can keep the pace with him in style. When he buys a neck scarf, he buys a whole bolt of silk and has a tie made, and keeps the rest of the silk so that no one else may have a duplicate."

Both men laughed at this description and the New York member said:

"Well, I must have seen this Secretary, then. I shall never forget his appearance. But, Slocum, there is one queer and altogether inexplicable thing about this town, and that is that newspapers seem to cost a cent more than their prices. Can you account for this?"

"No," said Robert, "I can't. I have had some surprises myself since we came to Washington. One of them is that I cannot find the traditional pretty Treasury young woman who has been written about so much. In vain do I look among the outpouring clerks from the Departments, but this young woman, who is supposed to be of dashing appearance and who is popularly supposed to spend her all upon her back, does not exist. You may search in vain among the tired, apathetic-looking throng of clerks. She is in reality in nine times out of ten a faded, quiet girl in a shabby gown that has seen hard use, who speeds along paying little heed to the crowd around her, and whose only future will be to marry some 'Sundowner' from a neighboring Department."

"Sundowner?" queried the New York member and I simultaneously. We had never heard of such an individual, and, somehow, the name of "White Cap" or "Kuklux" did not sound any more formidable to my ears.

"Why, yes," said Robert earnestly; "it seems that in all the Departments there are men who have been college bred, who have been graduated in the professions, but who have not made a go of life and have had to seek Government employ in order to live. Well, these men practice their professions half-secretly after office hours and thus eke out their livelihood, and they have become known as 'Sundowners,' and they are frowned down and in some cases dismissed when it becomes known.

"There are lots of such waifs here," continued Robert, "and I am told that when Congress adjourns, and the city becomes practically deserted of the best class of its inhabitants, then the odds and ends of humanity that have drifted in and lodged here come to the surface and stand out prominently against the background of quiet streets and deserted parks."

"Yes," said I, "it must be like a still place in a river. Have you ever noticed that many times in the course of a great river there will be still places where the water is darker colored, perhaps stagnant, and its surface covered over with bits of driftwood that have floated in out of the hurry and turmoil of the stream? I could fancy that Washington would be just such a bit of still water at midsummer."

When we left the House gallery, where we had been sitting, Robert suggested that we should go over to the Senate café, and, although the afternoon was already in its third quarter, thither we went. We sent for Senator P—— to make our party complete, and there we dawdled away an hour while those three men discussed everything political under the sun. Senator P—— brought with him several bits of news. One was that Senator Morgan's motion to take up the Canal bill had just been defeated, and the second was that the Supreme Court had just handed in its opinion in the Kentucky Governorship case—that it had no jurisdiction; the third was that the resolution to grant the privileges of the floor of the Senate to the Boer envoys had been tabled, and the fourth news was that the Clark case had gone over once more.

These three men drew their heads close together and their talk was earnest and low-toned.

"Of course," said Senator P——, "we all knew pretty well that the Supreme Court would render such an opinion, it could scarcely have done otherwise perhaps, but it is a noticeable fact that all the Democratic Justices on the bench were with Beckham, and that Harlan, the only Kentucky man, openly and vigorously dissented."

"It will result in another and fiercer fight for the Governorship," said Robert.

"What do you think of the Canal bill and its chances, and the chances for adjournment?" I asked.

"Well, things are about where they were last week in the Senate. I believe that Administration leaders will successfully block the Canal bill. Of course Morgan will call it up every chance that offers, and it may be defeated again and again. Even if consideration of it is voted down that cannot be considered a test of the strength of the measure. It would merely indicate that the majority wish to postpone it to next session. Truth is, we all to a man want to adjourn and get away from Washington, and its trying summer climate. The longer we sit the more complicated the situation will become, and there's a good deal at stake."

"I should think there was, what with all this fraud that is being unearthed in the Postal Service," croaked I.

"You see, Senator P——," broke in Robert, "Mrs. Slocum is still persuaded that we cannot pull our party machine through safely next November."

"Perhaps so," I retorted, "and, Senator P——, Mr. Robert John Slocum is like the illustrious Daniel Webster in one respect, that he sees no cure for any political ill save by the use of unlimited power of his own party, and in all crises he echoes Webster's words even if a knell be already ringing in his ears: 'For my part, in the dark and troubled night that is upon us, I see no star above the horizon promising light to guide us, but the intelligent, patriotic, united Republican party of the United States,' only Webster said 'Whig' instead of 'Republican.'"

"Surely you don't believe, Mrs. Slocum," interrupted the member from New York, "that a change of power would be the only way to correct or put a stop to these evils which, after all, are the evils which follow in the wake of every war, no matter what party is in power?"

"Oh, no," cried I quickly, ever staunch to party under all my grumbling, "but I do say this, that, in regard to these frauds, if the Republican party will strike boldly at the root of the evils instead of merely whacking away among the branches they would have a stronger claim to a perpetuation of their power."

"I believe that that is not only sound doctrine but sound politics, Mrs. Slocum," said the Senator, "but the trouble is that in these campaign years people won't look at things fairly. Ever since the early history of our country there has always been a great deal of working up of public sentiment, and everything that can be heaped upon an Administration in the way of abuse and criticism is resorted to when a campaign is on. George Washington, sickened of public life by attacks which, as he said in his own language, were 'in terms so exaggerated and indecent as could scarcely be applied to a Nero, a notorious defaulter, or even to a common pickpocket,' refused a third term and retired to private life. Adams, the impeccable, was accused of a variety of crimes, one of the least of which was that he was pandering to the Czar of Russia. Jackson was stigmatized as a murderer, a cock-fighter and a turf-sportsman. No man and no party can hope to escape in a campaign year when all kinds of censure, just and unjust, are used for bludgeons."

"Yes, and you know what Juvenal says of censure, that it pardons the ravens and censures the doves?"

After a moment or two the Senator changed the topic and asked:

"Has the curtain been rung down on your smart doings? Have you entered yet upon that intermediate season which somebody says is to the man or woman of pleasure more heavy than one would impose upon the vilest criminal?"

"Yes, I think I may say that the intermediate season has drawn on. There have been a few belated garden parties and one delightful pilgrimage to Mount Vernon gotten up by Secretary Root, while the Lady Regents were holding their session there."

"Well, I could never see any pleasure in these graveyard picnics," commented Robert.

"It was anything but a graveyard affair," said I; then I added as an afterthought when I recalled the impression made upon me:

"True, we did not go there reverently or tearfully as poor Lafayette did when he made his pilgrimage of love to his old friend's tomb to weep over his ashes, but there was something solemn and impressive in standing before that grated tomb and being told that 'Washington's remains were placed in its present resting place in 1837 and the door of the inner vault closed and the key dropped into the river.' I will confess that there was something grim and sobering in the thought that there was no escape from that tomb, with the key lying in the river."

"Well, at any rate it saved you from making the mistake of weeping over the ice-house that Mark Twain tells about," said the member from New York.

"What else did you do?" asked the Senator.

"We picked a few blossoms from the 'posy garden' and plucked a sprig of box from the old hedge around the garden which was laid out by George Washington after the plan of the garden at Versailles. We lunched in the superintendent's office, then we drove back to town over the old 'King's Highway' that leads through Alexandria. Secretary Root and General Corbin cavorted and pranced along on horseback at our side, while some of the young girls of the smart set, together with two or three army officers, loitered at the tail end of the cavalcade."

"Were the Bobby Shaftos along?" slyly asked the Senator.

"No, the 'Bobby Shaftos,' as you call them, are not back from their honeymoon."

"What are your plans after Congress adjourns?" asked he again.

"I am going to make a flying trip to Spruce City to take our venerable cousin home; then, while Robert is stumping his State for his party in the campaign, I shall go to Newport, where I hope to spend the greater part of the summer with Page and Alain de Courcelles, and where——"

Robert broke in here with a sly thrust at me which brought a smile to the faces of all of us around that table:

"Where the new Congressman's wife will hold her place against the field, and possibly enlarge that field against the time that she is a new Senator's wife."

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS CHAPTERS.—Harold Excell is the only son of the Rev. John Excell, pastor of the First Church, of Rock River. Intense, energetic and overbearing, he masters his associates or wins their lasting hate. To him has been imputed the leadership in all boyish scrapes. His intimate and confidant is Jack Burns. Together they discuss all accounts of the opening of the West, and talk of wild animals, Indians and adventures. Naturally alert and active, with the hunter's instinct, he has developed great skill in the use of horse, gun and pistol. The admiration which he craves he finds in Dot Burland, but at seventeen he learns she has "only pretended," amused by his enthusiasm for action; and, hurt and indignant, he drops her with characteristic suddenness.

THIRD CHAPTER—THE YOUNG EAGLE STRIKES

A FARMING village like Rock River is one of the quietest, most humdrum communities in the world till some sudden upheaval of primitive passion reveals the tiger, the ram and the wolf which decent and orderly procedure has hidden. Cases of murder arise from the dead level of every-day village routine like volcanic mountain peaks in the midst of a flowering plain.

The citizens of Rock River were amazed one Monday morning to learn that Dot Burland had eloped with the clerk in the principal bank in the town. Some of the people when they heard of it said, "I do not believe it," and when they were convinced, the tears came to their eyes. "She was such a pretty girl, and think of Mrs. Willard—and then Sam—who would have supposed Sam Willard could do such a thing!"

To most of the citizens it was drama; it broke the tedious monotony of every-day life; it was more productive of interesting conversation than a case of embezzlement or the burning of the county courthouse. There were those who smiled while they said, "Too bad, too bad! Any p'ticlers?"

Some of the women recalled their dislike of the lazy, pink-and-white creature whom they had often seen loitering on the streets or lying day after day in a hammock reading "domestic novels." The young girls drew together and conveyed the news in whispers. It seemed to overturn the whole social world so far as they knew it, and some of them hastened to disclaim any friendship with "the dreadful thing."

Of course the related persons came into the talk. "Poor Mrs. Willard and Harry Excell!" Yes, there was Harry; for a moment, for the first time, he was regarded with pity. "What will he do? He must take it very hard."

At about eleven o'clock, just as the discussion had reached this secondary stage, where new particulars were necessary, a youth, pale and breathless, with his right hand convulsively clasping his shoulder, rushed into the central drug store and fell to the floor with inarticulate cries of fear and pain. Out of his mouth, at last, came an astonishing charge of murderous assault on the part of Harold Excell. His wounds were dressed and the authorities notified to arrest his assailant.

When the officers found Harold he was pacing up and down the narrow alley where the encounter had taken place. He was white as the dead and his eyes were ablaze.

"Well, what do you want of me?" he demanded as the officer rushed up and laid hands upon him.

"You've killed Clint Slocum," replied the constable, drawing a pair of handcuffs from his pocket.

"Oh, drop those things!" replied Harold. "I'm not going to run; you never knew me to run."

Half ashamed, the constable replaced the irons in his pocket and seized his prisoner by the arm. Harold walked along quietly, but his face was terrible to see, especially in one so young. In every street excited men, women and children were running to see him pass. He had suddenly become alien and far separated from them all. He perceived them as if through a lurid smoke-cloud.

On most of these faces lay a smile, a ghastly, excited, pleased grin, which enraged him more than any curse would have done. He had suddenly become their dramatic entertainment. The constable gripped him tighter and the Sheriff, running up, seized his other arm.

Harold shook himself free. "Let me alone! I'm going along all right."

The officers only held him the closer and his rage broke bounds. He struggled till his captors swayed about on the walk and the little boys screamed with laughter to see the slender youth shake the big men.

In the midst of this struggle a tall man, without hat or coat and wearing slippers, came running down the walk with great strides. His voice rang deep and clear:

"Let the boy alone!"

It was the minister. With one sweep of his right hand he tore the hands of the Sheriff from the boy's arms; the gesture was bearlike in power. "What's the meaning of all this, Mr. Sawyer?" he said, addressing the Sheriff.

"Your boy has killed a man."

"You lie!"

"It's true—anyhow, he has stabbed Clint Slocum. He ain't dead, but he's hurt bad."

"Is that true, Harold?"

Harold did not lift his sullen glance. "He struck me with a whip."

There was a silence, during which the minister choked with emotion and his lips moved as if in silent prayer. Then he turned. "Free the boy's arm. I'll guarantee he will not try to escape. No son of mine will run to escape punishment—leave him to me."

The constable, being a member of the minister's congregation and a profound admirer of his pastor, fell back. The Sheriff took a place by his side, and the father and son walked on toward the jail. After a few moments the minister began to speak in a low voice:

"My son, you have reached a momentous point in your life's history. Much depends on the words you use. I will not tell you to conceal the truth, but you need not incriminate yourself—that is the law"—his voice was almost inaudible, but Harold heard it—"if Slocum dies—oh, my God! My God!"

His voice failed him utterly, but he walked erect and martial, the sun blazing on his white forehead, his hands clenched at his sides. There were many of his parishioners in the streets, and several of the women broke into bitter weeping, and many of the men imprecated the boy who was bringing white lines of sorrow into his father's hair. "This is the logical end of his lawless bringing up," said one.

The father went on: "Tell me, my boy—tell me the truth—did you strike to kill? Was murder in your heart?"

Harold did not reply. The minister laid a broad, gentle hand on his son's shoulder. "Tell me, Harold."

"No; I struck to hurt him; he was striking me: I struck back," the boy sullenly answered.

The father sighed with relief. "I believe you, Harold. He is older and stronger, too: that will count in your favor."

They reached the jail-yard gate and there, in the face of a crowd of curious people, the minister bowed his proud head and put his arm about his son and kissed his hair. Then, with tears upon his face, he addressed the Sheriff:

"Mr. Sheriff, I resign my boy to your care. Remember he is but a lad and he is my only son. Deal gently with him. Harold, submit to the law and all will end well. I will bring mother and Maud to see you."

As the gate closed on his son the minister drew a deep breath, a cry of bitter agony broke from his clenched lips: "O God, O God! My son is lost!"

The story of the encounter, even as it dribbled forth from Slocum, developed extenuating circumstances. Slocum was man-grown, a big, muscular fellow, rather given to bullying. A heavy carriage whip was found lying in the alley and this also supported Harold's story to his father. As told by Slocum, the struggle took place just where the alley from behind the parsonage came out upon the cross street.

"I was leading a horse," said Slocum, "and I met Harry and we got to talking, and something I said made him mad, and he jerked out his knife and jumped at me. The horse got scared and yanked me around, and just then Harry got his knife into me. I saw he was in for my life and I threw down the whip and run, the blood a-spurting out o' me, hot as b'ilin' water. I was scared, I admit that. I thought he'd opened a big artery in me, and I guess he did."

When this story, amplified and made dramatic, reached the ears of the minister, he said: "That is Clinton's side of the case. My son must have been provoked beyond his control. Wait till we hear his story."

But the shadow of the prison was on Harold's face and he sullenly refused to make any statement, even to his sister, who had more influence over him than Mrs. Excell.

A singular and sinister change came over him as the days passed. He became silent and secretive and suspicious, and the Sheriff spoke to Mr. Excell about it. "I don't understand that boy of yours. He seems to be in training for a contest of some kind. He's quiet enough in daytime, or when I'm around, but when he thinks he's alone he races up and down like a lynx—and jumps and turns handsprings, and all sorts of things. The only person he asks to see is young Burns. I can't fathom him."

The father lowered his eyes. He knew well that Harry did not ask for him.

"If it wasn't for these suspicious actions, Doctor, I'd let him have the full run of the jail yard, but I dassent let him have any liberties—why, he can go up the side of the cells like a squirrel! He'd go over our wall like a cat—no doubt of it."

The minister spoke with some effort. "I think you misread my son. He is not one to flee from punishment. He has some other idea in his mind."

To Jack Burns alone, plain, plodding and slow, Harold showed a smiling face. He met him with a boyish word—"Hello, Jack! How goes it?"—and was eager to talk. He reached out and touched him with his hands wistfully. "I'm glad you've come. You're the only friend I've got now, Jack." This was one of the morbid fancies jail life had developed; he thought everybody had turned against him. "Now, I want to tell you something—we're chums and you mustn't give me away: These fools think I'm going to try to escape, but I ain't. You see, they can't hang me for hurting that coward, but they'll shut me up for a year or two and I've got to keep healthy, don't you see? When I get out o' this I strike for the West, don't you see? And I've got to be able to do a day's work. Look at this arm." He stripped his strong, white arm for inspection.

In the midst of the excitement attending Harold's arrest, Dot's elopement was temporarily diminished in value, but some shrewd gossip connected the two events and said: "I believe Clint gibed Harry Excell about Dot—I just believe that's what the fight was about."

This being repeated, not as an opinion, but as the inside facts in the case, sentiment turned swiftly in Harold's favor. Clinton was shrewd enough to say very little about the quarrel. "I was just givin' him a little guff, and he up and lit into me with a big clasp-knife." Such was his story constantly repeated.

Fortunately for Harold, the case came to trial early in the autumn session. It was the most dramatic event of the year, and it was seriously suggested that it would be a good thing to hold the trial in the opera house in order that all the townspeople should be able to enjoy it. A cynical young editor made a counter suggestion: "I move we charge one dollar per ticket and apply the funds to buying a fire engine." Naturally, the Judge of the district went the calm way of the law, regardless of the town's ferment of interest in the case.

"I claim the right to be heard: will the Court refuse me the privilege of a word?"

"...rushed into the central drug store and fell to the floor"

The county attorney appeared for the prosecution, and old Judge Brown and young Bradley Talcott defended Harold.

Bradley knew Harold very well and the boy had a high regard for him. Lawyer Brown believed the boy to be a restless and dangerous spirit, but he said to Bradley:

"I've no doubt the boy was provoked by Clint, who is a worthless bully, but we must face the fact that young Excell bears a bad name. He has been in trouble a great many times, and the prosecution will make much of that. Our business is to show the extent of the provocation, and, secondly, to disprove so far as we can the popular conception of the youth. I can get nothing out of him which will aid in his defense. He refuses to talk. Unless we can wring the truth out of Slocum on the stand it will go hard with the boy. I wish you'd see what you can do."

Bradley went down to see Harold, and the two spent a couple of hours together. Bradley talked to him in plain and simple words, without any assumption. His voice was kind and sincere, and Harold nearly wept under its music, but he added very little to Bradley's knowledge of the situation.

"He struck me with the whip, and then I—I can't remember much about it, my mind was a kind of a red blur," Harold said, at last, desperately.

"Why did he strike you with the whip?"

"I told him he was a black-hearted liar."

"What made you say that to him?" persevered Bradley.

"Because that's what he was."

"Did he say something to you which you resented?"

"Yes—he did."

"What was it?"

Right there Harold closed his lips and Bradley took another tack.

"Harry, I want you to tell me something: Did you have anything to do with killing Brownlow's dog?"

"No," replied Harold disdainfully.

"Did you have any hand in the raid on Brownlow's orchard a week later?"

"No; I was at home."

"Did your folks see you during the evening?"

"No; I was with Jack up in the attic, reading."

"You've taken a hand in some of these things—raids—haven't you?"

"Yes, but I never tried to destroy things. It was all in fun."

"I understand. Well, now, Harold, you've got a worse name than belongs to you, and I wish you'd just tell me the whole truth about this fight, and we will do what we can to help you."

Harold's face grew sullen. "I don't care what they do with me. They're all down on me, anyway," he slowly said, and Bradley arose and went out with a feeling of discouragement.

"Hello, Jack! Have gone it?"—and was eager to talk

FOURTH CHAPTER—THE TRIAL

THE day of his trial came as a welcome change to Harold. He had no fear of punishment and he hated delay. Every day before his sentence began was a loss of time—kept him just that much longer from the alluring lands to the West. His father called often to see him, but the boy remained inexorably silent in all these meetings and the minister went away white with pain. Even to his sister Harold was abrupt and harsh, but Jack's devotion produced in him the most exalted emotion and he turned upon his loyal chum the whole force of his affectionate nature. He did not look up to Jack; he loved him more as a man loves his younger brother, and yet even to him he would not utter the words young Slocum had flung at him. Lawyer Talcott had asked young Burns to get at this if possible, for purpose of defense. But it was not possible.

The court met on the first Tuesday in September. The day was windless and warm, and as Harold walked across the yard with the Sheriff he looked around at the maple leaves, just touched with crimson and gold and russet, and his heart ached with desire to be free. The scent of the open air made his nostrils quiver like those of a deer. Jack met them on the path—eager to share his hero's trouble.

"Please, Sheriff, let me walk with Harry."

"Fall in behind," the Sheriff gruffly replied, and so out of all the town people Jack alone associated himself with the prisoner. Up the stairs whereon he had romped when a lad Harold climbed spiritlessly, a boy no longer.

The halls were lined with faces, every one as familiar as the scarred and scratched wall of the court-room, and yet all were now alien—no one recognized him by a frank and friendly nod, and he moved past his old companions with sullen and rigid face. His father met him at the door and walked beside him down the aisle to a seat.

The benches were crowded and every foot of standing space was soon filled. The members of the First Church were present in mass to see the minister enter, pale and haggard with the disgrace of his son.

The Judge, an untidy old man of great ability and probity, was in his seat, looking out absently over the spectators. "The next case" to him was only a case. He had grown gray in dealing with infractions of the law, and though kindly disposed he had grown indifferent—use had dulled his sympathies. His beard, yellow with tobacco stain, was still venerable, and his voice, deep and melodious, was impressive and commanding.

He was disposed to cut short all useless forms and soon brought the case to vital questions. Naturally, the prosecution made a great deal of Harold's bad character, drawing from ready witnesses the story of his misdeeds. To do this was easy, for the current set that way, and those who had only thought Harold a bad boy, now knew that he was concerned in all the mischief of the village.

In rebuttal, Mr. Talcott drew out contradictory statements from these witnesses and proved several alibis at points where Harold had been accused. He produced Jack Burns and several others to prove that Harold liked fun, but that he was not inclined to lead in any of the mischief of the town—in fact, that he had not the quality of leadership.

He pushed young Burns hard to get him to say that he knew the words of insult which Slocum had used. "I think he used some girl's name," he finally admitted.

"I object," shouted the prosecution, as if touched on a hidden spring.

"Go on," said the Judge to Talcott. He had become interested in the case at last.

When the lawyer for the prosecution cross-examined young Burns he became terrible. He leaned across the table and shook his lean, big, jointed finger in Jack's face. "We don't want what you think, sir; we want what you know. Do you know that Slocum brought a girl's name into this?"

"No, sir, I don't," replied Jack, red and perspiring.

"That's all!" cried the attorney, leaning back in his chair with dramatic complacency.

Others of Harold's companions were browbeaten into declaring that he led them into all kinds of raids, and when Talcott tried to stem this tide by objection, the prosecution rose to say that the testimony was competent; that it was designed to show the dangerous character of the prisoner. "He is no gentle and guileless youth, Your Honor, but a reckless young devil, given to violence. No one will go further than I in admiration of the Reverend Mr. Excell, but the fact of the son's lawless life cannot be gainsaid."

Slocum repeated his story on the stand and was unshaken by Bradley's cross-examination. Suddenly the defense said, "Stand, please."

Slocum arose—a powerful, full-grown man.

Bradley nodded at Harold. "Stand, also."

"I object," shrieked the prosecution.

"State the objection," said the Judge.

"Keep your position," said Bradley sternly. "I want the jury to compare you."

As the prisoner and the witness faced each other, the court-room blossomed with smiles. Harold looked very pale and delicate beside the coarse, muscular hostler, who turned red and looked foolish.

Ultimately the Judge sustained the objection, but the work was done. A dramatic contrast had been drawn, and the jury perceived the pusillanimity of Slocum's story. This was the position of the defense. Harold was a boy, the hostler had insulted him, had indeed struck him with a whip. Mad with rage, and realizing the greater strength of his assailant, the prisoner had drawn a knife.

In rebuttal, the prosecution made much of Harold's fierce words. He meant to kill. He was a dangerous boy. "Speaking with due reverence for his parents," the lawyer said, "the boy has been a scourge. Again and again he has threatened his playmates with death. These facts must stand. The State is willing to admit the disparity of strength, so artfully set forth by the defense, but it must not be forgotten that the boy was known to carry deadly weapons, and that he was subject to blind rages. It was not, therefore, so much a question of punishing the boy as of checking his assaults upon society. To punish him properly here would have a most salutary effect upon his action in future. The jury must consider the case without sentiment."

Old Brown arose after the State had finished. Every one knew his power before a jury, and the room was painfully silent as he walked with stately tread to a spittoon and cleared his mouth of a big wad of tobacco. He was the old-fashioned lawyer: formal, deliberate, and though everybody enjoyed Bradley Talcott's powerful speech, they looked for drama from Brown. The Judge waited patiently while the famous old lawyer played his introductory part. At last, after silently pacing to and fro for a full minute, he turned, and began in a hard, dry, nasal voice.

"Your Honor, I'm not so sure of the reforming effect of a penitentiary. I question the salutary quality of herding this delicate and high-spirited youth with the hardened criminals of the State." His strident, monotonous tone, and the cynical inflections of his voice made the spectators shiver with emotion as under the power of a great actor. He paced before the Judge twice before speaking again. "Your Honor, there is more in this case than has yet appeared. Every one in this room knows that the elopement of Dorothy Burland is at the bottom of this affair, every one but yourself, Judge. This lad was the accepted sweetheart of that wayward miss. This man Slocum is one of the rough, loud-spoken men of the village, schooled in vice and fisticuffery. You can well imagine, gentlemen of the jury," he turned to them abruptly, "you can well imagine the kind of a greeting this town loafer would give this high-spirited boy on that morning after the night when his inamorata disappeared with a married man. The boy has in him somewhat of the knight of the old time, Your Honor; he has never opened his lips in dispraise of his faithless love. He has refused to repeat the insulting words of his assailant. He stands today at a turning point of his life, gentlemen of the jury, and it depends on you whether he goes downward or upward. He has had his faith in women shaken; don't let him lose faith in law and earthly justice." His first gesture was on the word "downward," and it was superb.

Again he paused, and when he looked up again a twinkle was in his eyes and his voice was softer. "As for all this chicken-roasting and melon-lifting, you well know the spirit that is in that; we all had a hand in such business once, every man Jack of us. The boy is no more culpable now than you were then. Moreover, Excell has had too much of the mischief of the town laid on his shoulders—more than he deserves. 'Give a dog a bad name and every dead sheep is laid at the door of his kennel.'

"However, I don't intend to review the case, Your Honor! My colleague has made the main and vital points entirely clear; I intend merely to add a word here and there. I want you to take another look at that pale, handsome, poetic youth and then at that burly bully, and consider the folly, the idiocy and the cowardice of the charge brought against our client." He waited while the contrast which his dramatic utterance made enormously effective was being felt—then, in a deep, melodious voice, touched with sadness, he addressed the Judge:

"And to you, Your Honor, I want to say, we are old men. You on the bench and I here in the forum have faced each other many times. I have defended many criminals, as it was my duty to do, and you have punished many who deserved their sentences. I have seen innocent men unable to prove their freedom from guilt, and I have known men who are grossly criminal, because of lack of evidence—these things are beyond our cure. We are old, Your Honor: we must soon give place to younger men. We cannot afford to leave bench and bar with the stain of injustice on our garments. We cannot afford to start this boy on the road to hell at seventeen years of age."

He stopped as abruptly as he had begun, and the room was silent for a long time after he had taken his seat. To Harold it seemed as though he and all the people of the room were dead—that only his brain was alive. Then Mrs. Excell burst into sobbing. The Judge looked away into space, his dim eyes seeing nothing that was near, his face an impassive mask of colorless flesh. The old lawyer's words had stirred his blood, sluggish and cold with age, but his brain absorbed the larger part of his roused vitality, and when he spoke his voice had an unwontedly flat and dry sound.

"The question for you to decide," he said, instructing the jury, "is whether the boy struck the blow in self-defense, or whether he assaulted with intent to do great bodily injury. The fact that he was provoked by a man older and stronger than himself naturally militates in his favor, but the next question is upon the boy's previous character. Did he carry deadly weapons? Is he at heart dangerous to his fellows? His youth should be in mind, but it should also be remembered that he is a lad of high intellectual power, older than most boys of his age. I will not dwell upon the case; you have heard the testimony; the verdict is in your keeping."

During all this period of severe mental strain Mr. Excell sat beside Lawyer Brown, motionless as a statue, save when now and again he leaned forward to whisper a suggestion. He did not look at his son, and Harold seldom looked at him. Jack Burns sat as near the prisoner as the Sheriff would permit, and his homely, good face and the face of the Judge were to Harold the only spots of light in the otherwise dark room. Outside, the voices of children could be heard and the sound of the rising wind in the rustling trees. Once a breeze sent a shower of yellow and crimson leaves fluttering in at the open window, and the boy's heart swelled high in his throat, and he bowed his head and sobbed. Those leaves represented the splendor of the open spaces to him. They were like messages from the crimson sunsets of the golden West and his heart thrilled at the sight of them.

It was long after twelve o'clock and an adjournment for dinner was ordered. Harold was about to be led away when his father came to him and said:

"Harold, would you like to have your mother and me go to dinner with you?"

With that same unrelenting, stubborn frown on his face the boy replied: "No—let me alone."

A hot flush swept over the preacher's face. "Very well," he said, and turned away, his lips twitching.

The jury was not long out. They were ready to report at three o'clock. Every seat was filled, as before. The lawyers came in, picking their teeth or smoking. The ladies were in Sunday dress, the young men were accompanied by their girls, as if the trial were a dramatic entertainment. Those who failed of regaining their seats were much annoyed; others more thrifty had hired boys to keep their places for them during the noon hour, and others, still more determined, having brought lunches, had remained in their seats throughout the intermission and were serene and satisfied.

Harold was brought back to his seat, looking less haggard. He was not afraid of sentence; on the contrary, he longed to have the suspense end.

"I don't care what they do with me if they don't use up too much of my life," he said to Jack. "I'll pound rock or live in a dungeon if it will only shorten my sentence. I hate to think of losing time. Oh, if I had only gone last year!"

The Reverend Excell came in, looming high above the crowd, his face still white and set. He paid no heed to his parishioners, but made his way to the side of Lawyer Brown. The Judge mounted his bench and the court-room came to order instantly.

"Is the jury ready to report on the case of the State vs. Excell?" he asked in a low voice. He was informed that they were agreed. After the jury had taken their seats he said blandly, mechanically: "Gentlemen, we are ready for your verdict."

Harold knew the foreman very well. He was a carpenter and joiner, in whose shop he had often played: a big, bluff, good-hearted man whom any public speaking appalled and who stammered badly as he read from a little slip of paper: "Guilty of assault with intent to commit great bodily injury, but recommended to the mercy of the Judge." Then with one hand in his breeches pocket he added, "Be easy on him, Judge; I believe I'd 'a' done the same."

The spectators tittered at his abrupt change of tone and some of the young people applauded. He sat down very hot and red.

The Judge did not smile nor frown; his expressionless face seemed more like a mask than ever. When he began to speak it was as though he were reading something writ in huge letters on a distant wall.

"The Court is quite sensible of the extenuating circumstances attending this sad case, but there are far-reaching considerations which the Court cannot forget. Here is a youth of good family who elects to take up a life filled with mischief from the start. Discipline has been lacking. Here, at last, he so far oversteps the law that he appears before a jury. It seems to the Court necessary, for this young man's own good, that he feel the harsh hand of the law. According to the evidence adduced here to-day, he has been for years beyond the control of his parents and must now know the inflexible purpose of law. I have in mind all that can be said in his favor: his youth, the disparity of age and physical power between himself and his accuser, the provocation and the possession of the whip by the accuser—but all these are more than counterbalanced by the record of mischief and violence which stands against the prisoner."

There was a solemn pause, and the Judge sternly said: "Prisoner, stand up." Harold arose. "For an assault committed upon the person of one Clinton Slocum I now sentence you, Harold Excell, to one year in the penitentiary, and may you there learn to respect the life and property of your fellow-citizens."

"Judge! I beg——" The tall form of Mr. Excell arose, seeking to speak.

The Judge motioned him to silence.

Brown interposed: "I hope the Court will not refuse to hear the father of the prisoner. It would be scant justice if——"

Mr. Excell's voice arose, harsh, stern and quick. He spoke like the big man he was, firm and decided. Harold looked up at him in surprise.

"I claim the right to be heard; will the Court refuse me the privilege of a word?" His voice was a challenge. "I am known in this community. For seven years as a minister of the Gospel I have lived among these citizens. My son is about to be condemned to State's prison, and before he goes I want to make a statement here before him and before the Judge and before the world. I understand this boy better than any of you, better than the mother who bore him, for I have given him the disposition which he bears. I have had from my youth the same murderous rages; I have them yet. I love my son, Your Honor, and I would take him in my arms if I could, but he has too much of my own spirit. He literally cannot meet me as an affectionate son, for I sacrificed his good will by harsh measures while he was yet a babe. I make this confession in order that the Court may understand my relation to my son. He was born with my own temper mingled with the poetic nature of his mother. While he was yet a lad I beat him till he was discolored by bruises. Twice I would have killed him only for the intervention of my wife. I have tried to live down my infirmity, Your Honor, and I have at last secured control of myself, and I believe this boy will do the same, but do not send him to be an associate with criminals. My God, do not treat him as I would not do, even in my worst moments. Give him a chance to reform outside State's prison. Don't fix on him that stain. I will not say send me—that would be foolish trickery—but I beg you to make some other disposition of this boy of mine. If he goes to the penitentiary I shall strip from my shoulders the dress of the clergyman and go with him, to be near to aid and comfort him during the term of his sentence. Let the father in you speak for me, Judge. Be merciful as we all hope for mercy on the great day."

The Judge looked out over the audience of weeping women and his face warmed into life. He turned to the minister, who still stood before him with hand outstretched, and when he spoke his voice was softened and his eyes were kindly.

"The Court has listened to the words of the father with peculiar interest. The Court is a father and has been at a loss to understand the relations existing between father and son in this case. The Court thinks he understands them better now. As counsel for the defense has said, I am an old man, soon to leave my seat upon the bench, and I do not intend to let foolish pride or dry legal formalities stand between me and the doing of justice. The jury has decided that the boy is guilty, but has recommended him to the mercy of the Court. The plea of the father has enlightened the Court on one or two most vital points. Nothing is further from the mind of the Court than the desire to do injury to a handsome and talented boy. Believing that the father and son are about to become more closely united, the Court here transmutes the sentence to one hundred dollars fine and six months in the county jail. This will make it possible for the son and father to meet often and the father can continue his duties to the church. This the Court decides upon as the final disposition of the accused. The case is closed. Call the next case."

Hance's Proof

MRS. EDITH SESSIONS TUPPER, the author, is a Vassar graduate and a daughter of the late Congressman Sessions, of New York State. Probably the most interesting trip she ever took was through the Grand Cañon of the Colorado a year or so ago. She made the acquaintance there of John Hance, of Arizona, who lives in the cañon the year round and who knows more about it than any man living. Hance is a picturesque character with a vivid imagination, and this is some of the information he imparted to the tourist:

"Captain," Mrs. Tupper asked one morning as they sat before his cabin door on the rim of the cañon, "what was the greatest peril of your life?"

Hance considered a moment and then said: "I reckon about as nigh as I ever come ter going ter glory was when my hoss jumped fourteen hundred feet into the cañon with me on his back." Then he eyed Mrs. Tupper reflectively to see how she took it. She hesitated a moment and then replied:

"Of course, Captain, I realize that I am new out here, but you cannot expect me to believe any such story as that."

The Captain rose promptly, and leading his visitor to the very edge of the precipice demanded: "Now, then, ma'am, do you see suthin' white down there on the trail?"

Mrs. Tupper acknowledged that she did.

"Well," he said with an important grin, "that there white pile you see is the white bones of that there hoss of mine a-bleachin'."

And although Mrs. Tupper knew that the pile of bleaching bones on the trail belonged to a pack animal recently killed, she had not a word to say.

Paris and Its Charity Bazar Prices

IT SEEMS likely that Parisians, whose hatred of the English is equaled only by their contempt for the average American tourist, are to be wounded in their most vulnerable spot—the pocketbook. Preparations for an unparalleled plucking of the Anglo-Saxon race have been going forward in Paris, steadily, joyously, for several years back. The ending of the century furnished a pretext; a great exposition to celebrate it would prove the magnet to attract the loose dollars and sovereigns of the English-speaking world. An expansive smile of unctuous anticipation settled on the Parisian countenance, and the steamship companies raised their rates.

Though Americans have not entirely forgotten that it was unsafe to be a citizen of the United States in France during the early weeks of the Spanish-American War, and Englishmen will long remember the unspeakable insults offered to the Queen by certain Paris journals, they would doubtless have visited the Exposition in overwhelming numbers had it not been for the folly of those most to be benefited by their attendance. The French idea of profit is overcharge; of good business, extortion. And before their Fair, in all its incompleteness, was opened, the shop and hotel keepers had discarded the methods of the second-story man for those of the highway robber. Life in Paris, always a long list of extras for the tourist, had itself become an extra.

Not only was this bad business, but bad brigandage as well. Good sense should have dictated excursion rates on steamship and railroad, for it is more profitable to carry the million at a low fare than the thousand at a high one; and cheap accommodations, for there is more money in feeding and housing the crowd at coupon prices than the few at a fancy tariff. And then, once there, the Extra could have been brought out of hiding and let loose among the crowd, to take what the shopkeeper and the Midway spared.

It is too early yet to tell just how far Parisians have overreached themselves; for the steamship companies have already taken alarm and lowered their rates, but it is safe to say that thousands of Americans and Englishmen who intended to visit the Exposition have been frightened off by the premature fleecing of the advance guard of their compatriots. And for the Exposition to be the great financial success expected it must have the Anglo-Saxon contingent.

But even should it become possible now to make the trip and see the sights at a reasonable outlay, it is doubtful whether it is worth the time and trouble of the average American. Early reports indicate a rather second-class affair, inferior in size, in beauty and in completeness to the great Chicago Exposition. To those who saw the White City by the Lake, the Paris Fair would probably be a disappointment, and those who did not will doubtless have an opportunity to visit something better worth seeing at home early in the new century.

Woman is judged by her dress; man by his address.

The American Steer in Trouble

THE day that Congressman Dolliver prophesied, "when the American hog, with a curl of contentment in his tail, should travel untrammeled through the markets of the world," has not yet come, and now the American steer is in trouble. That obliging and adaptable beast, who generously yields up his choicest fat that on the kind-eyed cow alone may not devolve the labor of furnishing butter for the world's bread; who goes down into the refrigerating fleet by thousands that the roast beef of old England may not become merely a tradition, is threatened with expulsion from Germany, for whose comfort his plumpest bologna and his juiciest brisket, packed in tins of convenient sizes, have always been ready.

Something of the sort was to have been looked for as a sequence to the war-time, embalmed-beef talk. But whether or no the Government was then made the victim of injudicious experiment or the grasping avarice of one or two contractors, any one who is familiar with the facts knows that American food products are on the whole the best and the cleanest in the world; that our canned beef is finer in color and quality, and cleaner and more wholesome than that exported from "the Argentine" or put up in Europe. Discrimination against the American steer is unfair and unjust to an animal that feeds over the finest ranges, is fattened on the best corn, is killed, corned and tucked away in neat little tins by the cleanest possible methods and most scientific machinery in the world.

At best, retaliation is bad business, but we must have justice for the American steer even though we have to impose a prohibitive tariff on barons and pretzels and Noah's Arks.

One reason why pride goeth before a fall is that pride is able to raise itself high enough for the fall.

The Rage for Lectures

A GREAT deal of ridicule has been expended on "the rage for lectures," as it is called, which characterizes the American people, especially in New England. Instead of diminishing, through the satiety of hearers, the number of courses of lectures in our large towns is steadily increasing, and the throngs of listeners are swelling with each successive season. In Boston, the hotbed of lectures, the various courses at the Lowell Institute during the last winter attracted more than the usual number of hearers; and all the tickets for the last course, on Birds, were snapped up in fifteen minutes, to the great disappointment of hundreds who were anxious to secure seats.

This craze for lectures, as it is called by a certain class of literary cynics, is the theme from time to time of a great deal of owlish wisdom and cheap ridicule. The object of these lectures, it is said, is not to convey a thorough exposition of any subject, but merely to put in a lively and attractive form so much of it as is agreeable and entertaining, and to hide all the elaborate research and abstruse reasoning by which the results have been reached. The lecturer is deemed to have gained his point if he has skillfully dressed a rather spare dish of knowledge with occasional paradoxes, brilliant epigrams and startling discoveries of science, and sent away his audience pleased and tickled with the conceit of having gone to the bottom of a subject, or at least of having acquired its pith and essence, when they have only skimmed its surface.

What can be more foolish, the cynic triumphantly asks, than thus to waste one's time and money and injure one's health in the foul atmosphere of a crowded, stuffy, draughty lecture-room, when he can obtain the very same information, and a great deal more, in a popular treatise by a master of the subject, whose pages, when necessarily abstruse, he can read again and, moreover, can recur to, whenever he finds their contents slipping from a weak or treacherous memory?

The answer to these questions is not far to seek. Hundreds of persons go to public lectures as a pleasant and intellectual recreation. They do not expect, or, perhaps, care to obtain, a thorough knowledge or mastery of the subject discussed, but simply to possess themselves of its leading principles, its most pregnant or suggestive truths, and to learn the latest limits to which its investigation has been pushed. It sometimes happens that a frequenter of lectures, with no higher motives than these, finds his curiosity so piqued, his interest so stimulated, that the lecturer's discussion only whets his appetite, and he never rests till he has given years to its study and probed it to the quick.

The men who talk of "the lecture craze" seem to overlook the fact that "the rapture of noble words rushing across kingly lips" is a most powerful attraction. Oratory is the most intellectual and the most impassioned of the arts, and when the lecturer has rare elocutionary gifts, the charm of his speech is doubled. Again, the personality of the speaker, especially if he is a man of magnetic presence and national or world-wide fame, is a legitimate and potent attraction. Sometimes it is a matter of more interest than the lesson taught. Why do men flock, at great cost, to hear Hamlet or Macbeth at the theatre, when, without a penny's expense, they can read the masterpieces of tragedy at home?

To all such questions the answer is that no other attraction can rival that of the living presence. The knowledge conveyed by books is impersonal. It is cold and unpenetrating, compared with that which comes from the lips of a living teacher. One word alive and burning with the passion of a speaker has more significance than a hundred dead ones in a volume.

"Show me," said Omar, the caliph, to Amru, the warrior, "the sword with which you have fought so many battles and slain so many infidels." "Ah!" replied Amru, "the sword without the arm of the master is no sharper or heavier than the sword of Farezdak, the poet."

The man who waits for the office to seek him is satisfied in his own pride, but lonesome.

The Line of Colonial Pilferers

THE claim made by friends of the Administration, that the officials now charged with complicity in the Cuban postal frauds were men of tried honesty and efficiency, is at first comforting. But upon second thought, material for disquieting reflection is found in this claim. If these officials were men of probity prior to their connection with the Cuban posts, what changed their nature and their character? Undoubtedly their new environment.

At a home post an official is hedged about with checks of every kind; his actions are open to the observation of fellow-officials, the public, and, in these days, to the examination of an inquisitive press. There is, also, the restraining influence of home and the feeling of self-respect that is strongest when a man is among people he knows and whose good opinion he covets. Far from home and engaged in the work of inaugurating a new system of administration, none of these checks and restraints lie upon the official. And it is the lesson of history that men are likely to "go wrong" under such circumstances. It is this reflection that suggests that our first steps in the territory that has just come under our ownership or control are likely to be impeded by the peculation and maladministration that have always marked the early days of colonial governments, from the time of the rapacious governors of Greece and Rome, from the days of Clive and Hastings, to the thieving administrators of German, French and Belgian African possessions of to-day. These three nations are now going through the experience of England a century ago, when the East and West Indies and India afforded happy hunting-grounds for the avaricious colonial official, and when Cowper complained

> That thieves at home must hang, but he that puts
> Into his overgorged and bloated purse
> The wealth of Indian provinces escapes.

England long since profited by her experience, and now her colonial officials are the pride of the Empire. Spain, as old as England in colonial experience, never learned; to the last her officials regarded her colonial treasuries as tills to be pilfered. The lesson of the past policy and present position of the two nations is too obvious to call for comment.

We shall not, of course, see in the possessions for which we became responsible at the close of the war with Spain the old orgies of official fraud and peculation and malfeasance, and there are good grounds upon which to base the belief that our administration of Cuba, Puerto Rico and the Philippines will be marked by few, if any more, such scandals as that uncovered in the postal department of Cuba. Enough has been learned, however, from our own brief experience, and more may be learned from the experience of others, to show that good men may suddenly develop into thieves under the temptations afforded by the laxness of new and unguarded governments of distant colonies, and that something more than care in the selection of officials is needed to prevent such scandals as the present ones.

The Straightening of Crooked Politics

SLOWLY but surely the professional politicians and the men who place the dollar above the ballot are being made to realize that the movement for honest elections in this country is neither a farce nor a spasm. It is proceeding with all the solemn earnestness of a new commandment. Always it takes years to correct a wrong, to upset established ideas and conditions. It was more than a decade ago that sincere men began a crusade against the criminals high and low who make a business of corrupting the suffrage. One of the laws was the corrupt practices act which compelled every candidate to make a statement of his campaign expenses. It was laughed at as one of those chimerical notions which reformers sometimes have. "A man who would buy an election would not hesitate to lie about it," said the opposition very logically. But it so happened that a man who would spend money secretly for bribery and other criminal means got scared when he faced the dilemma of either telling the truth under oath, or of convicting himself as a perjurer. And thus the results have come to pass.

Not long ago, in an election in New York, a candidate for a judgeship admitted in his own handwriting that he contributed $10,000 to a party organization that had no more right to it than it had to a church collection. Recently we have seen one of the richest men in the whole United States turned out of the United States Senate. The fact that did as much as anything else to make the vote of the committee unanimous was his neglect to obey the law and to file a true account of his election expenses.

It is hard to exaggerate the tremendous importance of these laws. Said a distinguished Judge the other day: "In my circuit is a county which had probably the highest average of morality of any population of its size in the world. Twelve years ago the use of large sums of money in elections began, and the demoralization that has steadily followed is almost incredible. It has robbed men of their honor and women of their virtue. It has broken up homes and, in fact, has contributed to every grade of crime, including murder."

The same story could be told in other States and regions. However trite and familiar the term may be—for we hear it at the hustings every year—the ballot is the palladium of our liberties, and when thieves control it, and rich men corrupt it, the evils that result are as many as those which flew from the casket of Pandora. The great consolation is that progress is being made, and that the rascals who laughed at reform are finding that, after all, there is something in it.

At the English Capital

EVEN Lords have their virtues. Serving in South Africa at the time of writing there are more than forty Lords. There are four Dukes, viz.: the Duke of Norfolk, who is the premier Duke of the Kingdom; the Duke of Westminster, who is the richest aristocrat in England; the Duke of Marlborough, descendant of the famous fighter, and whose wife is your own Consuela Vanderbilt, and the Duke of Roxburghe, who is just a plain, every-day, sober, ordinary Duke; he is a young man who is serving as Lieutenant in the Royal Regiment of Horse Guards, better known to readers of English society novels as "The Blues." Of Earls there are almost any quantity, and they count among their number the Earl of Dunraven, whom some of the readers of The Saturday Evening Post may remember in connection with a race or so for the American Cup, and the Earl of Erroll, who formerly commanded the Royal Horse Guards.

In connection with Lords and war I have heard a story which brings in the name of the Earl of Rosebery, upon whose shoulders the mantle of Mr. Gladstone was supposed to fall. He has kept ominously quiet on the question of the war, and, perhaps, this has annoyed certain sections of the public. Anyhow, after a meeting one night, some roughs, for reasons best known to themselves, shied a few odds and ends at his carriage. The occurrence was recorded in the newspapers. Now, the Earl has sons at Eton, and in English public schools young aristocrats are always roughly handled and quickly have any snobbishness that may be in them jostled out. On the morning after the vegetable-flying episode, a bright Eton boy shouted across to one of Rosebery's sons:

"I say, Primrose, that governor of yours is a pretty clever man. He's got Kipling to advertise you, you know." Young Primrose did not know what was meant, of course.

"Why, you're the only son of a pelted Earl I know of."

Since then Rosebery's son has been called nothing else than "son of a pelted Earl." Here it may be mentioned that Lord Brooke, heir to the Warwick title and estates, is at the front with French's cavalry. He is not yet eighteen years of age, and is the youngest Lord on the shoot.

Lord Haddo's White Ribbon Studies

Another Lord story. Lord Haddo, eldest son of the Earl of Aberdeen, has just come of age amid great rejoicing up Scotland way. Lord Aberdeen, it will be remembered, was Governor-General of Canada, and Lady Aberdeen there, as over here, took an energetic part in temperance and other social reform work. Both Lord and Lady Aberdeen have brains, and know how to use them, but, to all appearances, young Lord Haddo, the heir to the Earldom, will set no river afire, even though it be made of more inflammable material than the Thames. When Aberdeen was in Canada he sent Lord Haddo across to France in charge of a French tutor. The two were to cycle together through the most glorious districts of France, to see the scenery, and instruct themselves in the customs and language of the country and all that. Well, the unfortunate tutor was driven almost to despair before he could bid good-by to the wheel and take to a transatlantic liner again. To begin with, his pupil could not summon up presence of mind in the most innocent of circumstances, and if a dog trotted across the road a hundred yards ahead of his bicycle, Haddo would lose his grip, the machine would wobble and, let his teacher shout what warnings he might, the young aristocrat would find himself pitched into the hedge by the roadside. One thing in the young Lord's favor was that he never lost his good nature, and would pick himself up, laughing heartily, mount again without complaint, and ride on bravely to meet the next disaster, which was sure to befall him inside of the hour. One of the districts through which tutor and Lord cycled was the Champagne region. For two days they had pedaled their way along winding roads between immense, interminable vineyards, the vines then in full leaf. Not a tree was to be seen, not a bush, nothing but vines, vines, vines. On the afternoon of the second day Haddo called out to his tutor in a thin, boyish voice: "Teacher, teacher!" "Well, what is it, Haddo?" Cautiously nodding his head to the vines that clad the countryside, the young Lord said: "I say, teacher, those are hops, are they not?" The tutor fell off the machine this time.

The Shuffling of London Editors

I notice that of all the experts who are writing in the English newspapers, criticising day by day the various changes of the campaign in South Africa, there is no one of them whose opinions are so generally quoted both in England and the United States as Spencer Wilkinson, of the Morning Post. For many years Mr. Wilkinson has been a famous writer on all things pertaining to military matters, but the public looked for his articles only in the more expensive reviews or in book form. None dreamt of meeting with his name in the columns of a penny paper. Yet all those years he had been writing away day by day for the Morning Post, and no one a whit the wiser. But a born journalist changed all that. That born journalist was and is James Nicol Dunn. Mr. Dunn is a Scotsman, of course. In the beginning of things I believe he worked for the Scotsman, Scotland's greatest daily, but some ten or twelve years ago he joined the poet Henly, and together they produced the Scots Observer, a spirited, somewhat acid weekly, to which, it will be remembered, Kipling contributed before overwhelming success came to him. The Scots Observer ran a course of literary brilliance and financial distress, left its native northland and journeyed to London like an invalid in a panic for health, only to hesitate, decline and die. Shortly before the coppers were placed upon its eyes, Dunn was offered and accepted the position of news editor on Astor's paper, the Pall Mall Gazette, and held that post during the brilliant run of the paper under Editor Harry Cust. Shortly before the Astor-Cust quarrel, which resulted in the clever editor's resignation, Dunn took upon his shoulders the editorship of Black and White, one of the most successful of big British illustrated weeklies. In fact, Dunn undoubtedly made Black and White, and placed it alongside the Graphic and News in popular favor. Then the editorial chair of the Morning Post fell vacant, and James Nicol Dunn, parting his coat-tails, sat down in it. On that day a marvelous change came over the Post. It hitherto had a moderately large circulation, but was read exclusively by women, who devoured the fashionable intelligence and general snobbery that filled its columns to the exclusion of vital news. The ladies still buy, but so do the men now, for Dunn has made the Morning Post one of the most virile and progressive dailies in the Kingdom. He found writing in his columns anonymously a number of celebrated men. One day before the paper went to press he issued instructions, and the next morning people were startled and delighted to see, by signatures to articles, cablegrams and news, that many able men had begun to contribute to the Post. Among those signatures there is none more popular than Spencer Wilkinson, who, like the rest of them, for years had been writing the same sort of articles that are now so widely quoted. There is something to be said in favor of editors, after all—that is, some editors.

A New Kipling Conundrum

Kipling has returned to his home in England, and is once again a sober, suburban gentleman down Brighton way. After a lifetime spent in writing soldiers' stories, songs and verse, he has been studying hospital trains and giving his observations to the press here. No doubt those observations were widely read in the States as well as in the United Kingdom. Now, in the London Press Club, the most practical institution of its kind in the world, there is a limited circle of members—a circle never likely to grow larger—that sits around and indulges in spelling-bees and conundrum compounding whilst waiting for the hour to arrive when duty calls. The other day these journalists were racking their brains in order to confound each other with subtle conundrums when one sprung this on his fellow-sufferers: "Which one of Gilbert and Sullivan's operas is Kipling the reverse of?" When they gave it up he made answer: "Why, the opera is called Ruddygore, whereas Kipling is Gory Rud."

The Evolution of the London Policeman

If Professor Ray Lankester, the controller of that vast storehouse of art treasures and curiosities, South Kensington Museum, accepts the latest knickknack that has been offered him, the Paris Exhibition will be compelled to take a back seat this year. All artistic America, and many in the United States who have no claim to ability in art, will remember that three or four years ago the famous Professor came up from his University to London to attend a farewell dinner to a friend. Leaving the dining-room, Professor Lankester proceeded to walk across Piccadilly to his club when he suddenly came upon a knot of quarreling people. He paused to look on, and his pause was disastrous. A burly policeman strode up to the learned man and ordered him to move on. Lankester indignantly told the policeman to mind his own business. The policeman minded it according to his lights, by haling the austere Professor to the Vine Street Police Station and locking him up as a disorderly character.

After some considerable trouble the agitated Professor got bail and next morning appeared before Newton, the most unjust magistrate London has seen for many a long day. Great men, famous men of all sorts and kinds, came forward on behalf of the Professor, but to no purpose. The evidence of the police was quite enough for Newton who, in the end, inflicted a fine. This raised a great storm against the London police and since then the "peelers" have been a little more careful.

Well, Professor Lankester has now taken charge of South Kensington Museum and, among other attractions, he is arranging objects in order according to the Darwinian theory. For instance, a jungle-fowl stands surrounded by specimens of the breeds of barnyard fowl that have sprung from her; a rock pigeon, an ordinary looking bird, has around it the fancy breeds, and even the oyster is made to illustrate development otherwise than in a stew. When this enterprise was announced, the Professor received a letter from the medical students of St. Bartholomew's Hospital. Now, medical students in London do not love policemen. The St. Bart's boys wrote congratulating Professor Ray Lankester on his idea, and said they were desirous of assisting him. They remembered his little matter at Vine Street, and if he would arrange a glass case containing a jackal, a rhinoceros, a fox and a jackass, they would undertake to supply him with an embalmed policeman to represent the development of the combination. The Professor is considering the matter.

'Angin' 'Enry 'Awkins Bested

Only sporting men in America will be likely to know anything of the "Waterloo Cup." The Waterloo Cup, nevertheless, is one of the greatest sporting events that annually come off in this land of outdoor recreations; it is, in fact, the greyhound Derby. The greyhound that wins the Waterloo Cup occupies the position in dog society that the Derby winner does in horse land. But many in the United States have heard of our great hanging Judge, Sir Henry Hawkins. Hawkins is supposed to have taken a keen delight in sentencing murderers to the gallows; certainly he was very prolific of executions. He has now retired from the bench, being created Lord Brampton, and occupies a seat in the House of Lords.

During the running of the Waterloo Cup Lord Brampton happened to stroll out into the lobby of the House of Lords wherein stands the "tape," or "ticker," machine. A crowd stood around watching for the news as it was ticked out. At the moment the ex-Judge entered a strange record came over the wires, and a subdued shout went up to the late Judge Hawkins to read the news. Lord Brampton hastened over and read:

"Waterloo Cup—Backslider beat Judge Hawkins."

Lord Brampton grinned and said:

"Well, I don't think he ever did in the law courts." —E. W. SABBEL.

The Kidnaping of President Lincoln

PART FOURTH

THE President looked into Bethune's eyes and seemed to understand the situation. "Well, you'd certainly make a fine actor," he remarked.

"Come, Mr. President; we have not a moment to lose," said Bethune.

"Let me get my hat," suggested the President. Having secured this he said: "Some sort of weapon is necessary where force is talked of."

"What is this?" asked Bethune, holding up a pistol.

"And this?" said Mr. Sanders, holding up its mate.

"The argument is concluded and the witness is with you," remarked Mr. Lincoln with a chuckle. Then he added: "But kidnaping can't be carried on on foot. I'm a pretty good walker, but if I was to take the studs and lie down in the road, you'd have some trouble."

"The carriage waits, Mr. Lincoln," replied Bethune grimly. "Remember, you are supposed to be going of your own accord."

"By jing!" exclaimed the President: "I reckon this is what the play-actors call a full-dress rehearsal."

He went forward very cheerfully, however. When they came to the carriage the President entered first, Bethune following. Mr. Sanders mounted to the driver's seat.

"Where are you, Sanders?" inquired Mr. Lincoln.

"I'm goin' to take the air," Mr. Sanders replied.

"Well, here, swap hats with me. I can't wear mine in here unless we cut a hole in the roof."

Mr. Lincoln leaned from the window and passed his tall hat up to Mr. Sanders, and received in return the soft felt hat that Mr. Sanders wore.

The carriage turned into the street and went whistling away in the direction arranged by John Omahundro.

"Which way are we going?" the President asked.

"I couldn't say, Mr. President; I'm not familiar with this part of the country."

Mr. Lincoln said nothing more for some little time. Then, "Don't you think this affair is getting to be a little too natural?" he suggested.

"I had some such idea, Mr. President," replied Bethune.

"I was thinking," said Mr. Lincoln, "that if Stanton should come to the White House and find me gone, and begin to inquire about it—I was just thinking what would happen to that kinswoman of yours."

"Well, he would have to reckon with Mrs. Lincoln," replied Bethune.

"That's so," assented the President with a chuckle. "Stanton is not much of a favorite with any of the family except me. But if Mrs. Lincoln should take alarm, then there would be trouble for the Southern lady."

This was a new phase of the affair. But Bethune felt that Providence or Fate had tied his hands. He could do nothing. They went forward rapidly for two or three miles. Then they heard a protesting voice:

"Hold on there, will you! Hain't you got no eyes in your blamed noggin? I lay if I take a rock an' knock you off 'n that barouche you'll think you saw somethin'."

There was a light wagon in the road to which a couple of horses were hitched. The driver of Bethune's carriage stopped his team, handed the reins to Mr. Sanders and joined the complaining person, who was no other than John Omahundro, in the road.

"Wait!" said the latter in a low tone. He put his hand to his ear and listened. "I hear a cavalry squad coming. Jump on the carriage, turn around—there's plenty of room here—and drive back the way you came."

"Any danger for me?" asked the driver nervously.

"Not a bit in the world," responded Omahundro. "Get a move on you; you want the cavalry to meet you with your horses' heads turned toward town."

No time was lost in making this movement. The driver put the lash to the horses as they were making the turn, and when they met the squad of pursuing cavalry the carriage was moving toward the city at a brisk trot.

"Halt!" cried a commanding voice.

"Well, if you know'd who you was haltin', maybe you wouldn't be so uppity," exclaimed Mr. Sanders.

The Captain, making out the outline of Mr. Lincoln's hat, which the genial Georgian was wearing, cried out: "Is that you, Mr. President?"

For answer, Mr. Lincoln leaned his head from the window and said: "Yes, it's me; what's the trouble? Any bad news from the front? Speak out, my man. I'm used to trouble. You seem to be excited; what is it?"

"Why, Mr. President, Mr. Stanton is at the White House in a great state of alarm. He thinks you have been seized and carried off. He gave me orders to take ten men, pursue the carriage and overtake it at all hazards."

"What then?" asked Mr. Lincoln.

"He took me aside, Mr. President," explained the Captain, "and said: 'When you catch those villains, let your patriotism dictate your course.'"

"Well, what does your patriotism dictate?" asked Mr. Lincoln dryly.

"I am under your orders, Mr. President. If you have none to give, I will have the honor of escorting you to the White House."

"It is unnecessary," replied Mr. Lincoln. "Ride on ahead and, when you arrive at the White House, tell Secretary Stanton to disband his forces, horse, foot and dragoons, take down the barricades, and permit my friends and myself to enter on the terms that have always existed."

The officer saluted in the dark and was about to give the necessary orders, when Mr. Lincoln again spoke. "What time is it?"

The officer struck a match and looked at his watch.

"Ten-fifty, Mr. President."

"Thank you. The Secretary was a notch or two ahead of time," Mr. Lincoln remarked.

"Yes, Mr. President. A man named Doyle arrived from the South to-night, and informed the Secretary that two rebels——"

"You mean Confederates, I reckon, Captain," suggested Mr. Lincoln.

"Yes, Mr. President, two Confederates had come to Washington for the purpose of kidnaping you. When he described the men, the Secretary made haste to the White House, summoning me as he went. When he arrived there and found you had gone off with the very men accused by Doyle, you may imagine his excitement."

"Yes; I'm mighty glad I wasn't there. Well, Captain, you have acted with commendable energy, and I am under obligations to you. Call on me some day at the White House. I want to have a talk with you."

"Thank you, Mr. President; I have simply done my duty." He wheeled his horse, gave a curt order to his detachment, and the small cavalcade was soon clattering toward the White House, where, in no long time, the Captain reported to the Secretary, who was still in a fury of rage and excitement.

"Did you seize the two spies? Where are they?" he thundered.

"Under the circumstances, Mr. Secretary, I could but obey the commands of the President."

"Remain here with your men," Mr. Stanton said. Then, his fury getting the better of him, he paced up and down the floor crying, "Oh, he will ruin the country!"

"Don't you think you had better restrain yourself, Mr. Secretary?" asked Mrs. Lincoln, who, coming out of the state of alarm and apprehension into which she had been thrown by the wild and stormy excitement of Mr. Stanton, was now somewhat angry.

"Nothing but Providence has saved your husband from those two spies and traitors—that is, if he is saved. They had everything planned to carry him off to-night."

"I don't believe a word of it!" exclaimed Mrs. Lincoln.

"But every word is true, madam," declared Doyle, who was sticking as close to the Secretary as he dared. "They planned it in my presence in Richmond."

"I don't know you," replied Mrs. Lincoln. "What were you doing in Richmond?"

"Serving my country to the best of my poor ability, madam."

"As a spy?" There was so much scorn in the lady's voice that Doyle assumed a more chastened attitude.

After a while the carriage drove up, and the President, Bethune and Mr. Sanders alighted. Mr. Lincoln was in high glee. As the carriage stopped, he was saying to Bethune: "You remember when I asked you if the affair wasn't getting to be too natural, too real?"

Bethune assented, but the President waited until they were near the portico of the White House, then he continued:

"Well, I remember it, too. It reminds me of the fellow who set out to play ghost in his village. He had tolerable success, until he happened to run across a crabbed old fellow who had a good deal of money out at interest. The ghost says: 'Squire Brown, you've got too much money. What'll you do with it when you die?' Squire Brown gripped his hickory, and says, 'You talk lots too natural for a ghost,' and with that he lit in and trailed the fellow out."

Bethune had no time to digest the moral which might or might not be attached to this brief narrative of a village incident. As the three walked into the light, Secretary Stanton cried out with a voice full of passion:

"Mr. President, I hope you are convinced that I was correct in what I said about those detestable spies. Captain Bird, do your duty!"

But before the Captain could make a movement Mrs. Lincoln burst into a fit of uncontrollable laughter, in which she was joined by all except Mr. Stanton. Even the officer failed to maintain his dignity. Mr. Lincoln, tall and lank, was wearing Mr. Sanders felt hat, which, slouched as it was, gave him the aspect of a pirate. On the other hand, Mr. Sanders was wearing Mr. Lincoln's tall beaver. It was tipped to one side a trifle, and this, together with the fact that he wore a bobtail jeans coat, added the last touch of the comic to his rotund figure. Mr. Lincoln joined in and led the laughter, and for several long minutes the hilarity ran high, while Mr. Stanton gazed with undisguised scorn and contempt upon the scene.

Presently, taking advantage of a lull in the laughter, he cried in harsh, commanding tones:

"Captain Bird, arrest those men!"

"Why, what have we done, Stanton?" demanded Mr. Lincoln. "What are we guilty of?"

The Secretary, with an angry gesture, turned to Doyle.

"Mr. President," said Doyle, "these men came here to seize you and carry you off. I am willing to make oath to that fact. But for the energy of Secretary Stanton to-night their plot would have succeeded."

"What is your opinion, Captain Bird? What did you find when you came up with your detachment?" inquired Mr. Lincoln.

"Mr. President, we met the carriage on its way to the White House and, in accordance with your orders, hurried here in advance of it."

"My friend," said the President, turning to Doyle, "if there was any plot to kidnap to-night, I'm the guilty party."

"That's so, Mr. President," Mr. Sanders solemnly asserted. "You not only took us off, but you took my hat. It looked to me like mighty squally times out there in the dark road, but, anyhow, I thank you kindly for fetchin' us back."

"Oh, you are more than welcome, friend Sanders. There's another thing I want to say to you gentlemen," remarked Mr. Lincoln, straightening himself up: "The less you say of this affair the better. If it slips into the newspapers I propose to see that the public get the straight of it. One thing more: these gentlemen here—Mr. Bethune and Mr. Sanders—are in Washington by my invitation; they are my guests; I am responsible for their conduct here, and whoever interferes with them will be held responsible by me. Captain Bird, I thank you again for the energetic way in which you carried out your orders. If the Secretary of War has no more for you to-night, neither have I."

Mr. Stanton had retired in disgust to the inner office, where the Captain sought him, returning in a moment to bid the President good-night and to lead his squad of cavalry to their quarters.

Mr. Doyle stood where the Secretary had left him, and his embarrassment was so plain that Bethune, following one of his impulses, said:

"Mr. President, I think I can set Mr. Doyle right, but before I do so I'd like to ask what grudge he bears me."

"Grudge! I have no grudge against you," Doyle asserted.

"Why did you try to use my own hand to entrap me? Why did you intrust me with a dispatch in which you committed me to the gallows, not for the good of the country, but for the advancement of yourself and your friend Awtry?"

"Why, I gave you no such dispatch as that," Doyle asserted.

"Well, the President has a copy of it," remarked Bethune dryly.

Mr. Lincoln looked at Doyle with a puzzled expression on his face. He seemed to be studying the man. It was a very embarrassing stare.

"What put the notion in your head," said the President, turning to Bethune with something like a sigh, "that the gentleman needed to be set right with me?"

"It struck me, Mr. President, that you might misunderstand him, considering all the circumstances," replied Bethune.

"No; I think I understand him perfectly." But he still continued to regard Mr. Doyle with a puzzled, melancholy expression on his face.

"But if you will permit me to explain, Mr. President," Bethune persisted.

But Mr. Lincoln shook his head and raised his long arm in a protesting gesture. "No, not now; I'll have a talk with this gentleman at another time. He must excuse me now. Bethune, you and Mr. Sanders come into my private office."

He bowed to Doyle and went out. As Bethune was following, Doyle caught him by the arm and detained him. "What did you intend to say to him?" he asked.

"Why, I intended, and still intend, to tell him the simple truth," replied Bethune.

"That you came to kidnap him?" gasped Doyle.

"Why, certainly. I don't want him to believe that you are engaged in ensnaring men merely to advance your own fortunes."

"Do you think I'd do the like for you?" inquired Doyle.

"Why, I never asked myself the question," replied Bethune, regarding the man with a smile. "I owe you no good will, but I owe it to myself to be honest and straightforward. Now, answer me this: why did you have men ready to follow me out of Richmond?"

Doyle hesitated, but finally spoke out: "I wanted to make sure that you fell into the hands of the right parties when you reached Washington. If I had it to do over again, it wouldn't be done. And I want to say to you that I'm glad I met you."

"Well, we have no time for compliments. Good-night."

Mr. Sanders was waiting for Bethune, and together they went into Mr. Lincoln's private office. The President and Mr. Stanton were in the larger room, and the tones of their voices, coming through the door, showed that they were conversing as if nothing unusual had occurred. Indeed, it seemed that Mr. Stanton had been, for the moment, entirely subdued.

Presently Mr. Lincoln came to the door. "Sanders, you and Bethune come in here. I want you to see that my Secretary of War is not always ready to eat folks up."

Mr. Stanton greeted them in a friendly manner. He had his glasses off for the moment, and for the first time the two Southerners saw that in repose his features were cast in a genial mould, and that his eyes could command a kindly expression.

"Bethune," said the President, "what was that explanation you wanted to make about Doyle? Mr. Stanton seems to appreciate his abilities. I don't know how able he is, but that last part of his dispatch doesn't sound nice to me. Mr. Stanton agrees with me about this, but he says the first part is correct." The copy of the dispatch lay open on the table between the President and the Secretary.

"Mr. President, after what has happened to-night, taking everything as it occurred, I feel sure that you'll not misunderstand my motives when I say to you that the first part of Mr. Doyle's dispatch is correct." Bethune's tone was quiet, but firm.

"I told you so," remarked Mr. Stanton with emphasis.

"Well, then, why didn't you carry out your plan to-night?"

"They had a very good reason," exclaimed the Secretary of War.

"Mr. President," said Mr. Sanders, suddenly and emphatically, "there ain't enough cavalry in fifty mile of this town to 'a' kept us from carryin' you off to-night. You know where we turned around? Well, right there was a light wagon, an' all we had to do was to hustle you in it. The man a-drivin' it knows ev'ry foot of ground betwixt here an' Richmond."

"No doubt," said Mr. Lincoln; "but why didn't you take advantage of all this?"

"Mr. President, I would as soon kidnap my grandfather, or some one else equally dear to me," Bethune declared. "But it was a great temptation."

"It was so, especially to a young feller," remarked Mr. Sanders. "When the bosses turned I fully expected Frank to stick his head out an' use some words that you don't hear in parlors; an' when he didn't, I never was so happy in my life. What we mought 'a' done if you hadn't gone an' kidnaped yourself right before our face, I can't say. I'm like the feller the mule kicked in the stomach. Says he, 'I seed her switch her tail—that I seed p'intedly. What she done arter that, I can't say.'"

"If you would only trust me, Mr. President!" exclaimed Mr. Stanton. There was no bitterness in his voice.

"Why, I trust you precisely as far as I can trust myself," replied Mr. Lincoln earnestly. "No man could do more; would any other man do as much?"

The Secretary made no reply. He resumed his spectacles and turned to Bethune.

"But why, now that the affair is over, do you come in here and admit what nobody could have proved. What is Doyle to you?"

"Less than nothing, Mr. Secretary. I think the President understands my motives."

"Perfectly, perfectly," said Mr. Lincoln. "But I don't understand why you changed your mind when you had everything in your own hands."

"Well, I can only say this, Mr. President, that if the plain people of the South knew you as well as we know you, the war wouldn't last much longer."

Mr. Lincoln arose from his chair and laid his hand on Bethune's shoulder. "My son," he said solemnly, "no human being ever did or ever can pay me a higher compliment than that. I wish all your people would take a month off and come up here to kidnap me!"

"They are engaged in some such adventure now," remarked Mr. Stanton dryly.

The President paid no attention to the remark, but walked about the room with his hands behind him and his head forward. Finally he paused and stood before Bethune and Mr. Sanders, his feet planted somewhat apart.

"I'll tell you gentlemen the honest truth," he declared, raising his right arm high above his head, "my heart bleeds night and day for every wound the war inflicts on both sides. If I know my own mind, I know no North and no South. All that I hope for and pray for is the Union—the Union preserved, and the Union at peace, with all factions and all parties working together for the glory and greatness of the Republic. I would, if I could, take the South in my arms and soothe all her troubles, and wipe out all the old difficulties and differences, and start the Nation on a new career. I have the will, but not the power." He paused a moment, and then resumed with a smile: "Stanton there says I'm a politician, and, I reckon I am, but if I were nothing else I'd be ashamed of myself."

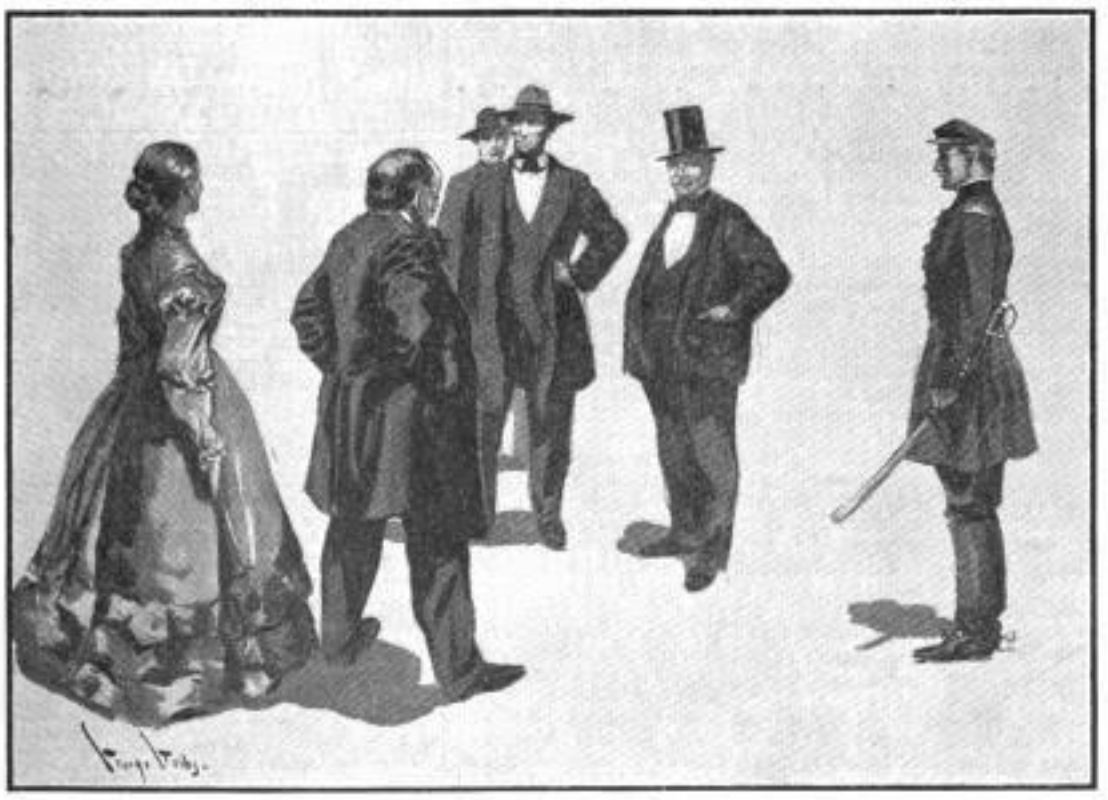
"Mr. President," said Bethune gravely, "if we had found you to be a politician, petulant and intriguing, you wouldn't be here to-night."

"Ain't it the truth!" exclaimed Mr. Sanders with unction.

"Well, Mr. President," remarked Mr. Stanton, rising from his chair, "your friends are more agreeable than I supposed they would be. But hereafter I hope you will believe that I know what I am talking about."

"Why, I never doubted it," Mr. Lincoln declared; "but you'll have to take me as you find me."

"The trouble wi' him, Mr. President," said Mr. Sanders, "is that he's afraid he'll not be able to find you."



The Secretary regarded Mr. Sanders from behind his inscrutable glasses, smiled faintly, and exclaimed, "Ain't it the truth!" Then, as if the effort to mimic Mr. Sanders had thawed him out, he shook hands with the two Southerners, laughing softly to himself, and went out. The episode was sufficient to show that the great War Secretary (and he was truly great in his line) could be agreeable when he chose to be.

"That's the only fun he's had since the war began," Mr. Lincoln asserted.

Nothing more remains to be told. Bethune, Mr. Sanders and Mrs. Elise Clogton had no difficulty in making their way South. They had an escort through the Federal lines, and were turned over to their compatriots under a flag of truce.

(THE END)

As the three walked into the light, Secretary Stanton cried out with a voice full of passion

Stories of Old-Time Shows and Showmen

From the Notes of W. C. Coup Edited by Forrest Crissey

— entered and drew his revolver to kill

NOTHING can afford a better idea of the variety and picturesqueness of a showman's life than the medley of odd incidents, of strange experiences and homely happenings that crowd the thought of a veteran when in a reminiscent mood. Under this kind of inspiration I have jotted down, in a scrappy and haphazard way, the episodes which sufficiently impressed me at the time of their occurrence to claim frequent rehearsal when talking over the "old days" with other pioneers of the tent and the ring. I must begin with a word concerning the greatest clown America ever saw.

Dan Rice was, at one time, the most famous circus performer in America, and, with the exception of John Robinson, the most daring. I have never met a more nervy man; he was without an equal in trying emergencies. He would face a mob at any time and under any circumstances. Besides being a natural fighter he was a natural orator. He had a sonorous, penetrating voice, his enunciation was clear and distinct, and he knew the secret of flattering and delighting his auditors. Dan had many competitors for the patronage of the river towns, the most prominent of whom were two veteran showmen who owned a Floating Palace. The "Palace" was simply a large boat fitted up as an opera house with the most elegant appointments. It would seat several hundred people and was provided with a complete stage and elaborate sets of scenery. This was towed by a tug called the "James Raymond," on which all the performers roomed and took their meals. They had, besides, a steamer called the "Banjo," on which they gave a minstrel performance.

Dan Rice's One-Horse Show

Dan had formerly been "featured" as one of their attractions; but, some trouble arising, he had left them and started in business on his own account. He experienced the usual ups and downs of a showman's life, finally "went broke," and was at last cleaned out to what he boldly announced as "Dan Rice's One-Horse Show." With this little affair he courageously fought his former associates and did a large business. During the performances he was in the habit of singing a song entitled My One-Horse Show, which took the popular fancy and materially helped him. In this song he told how the opposition had placed false buoys in the river, thereby misleading his pilots and throwing him on sand bars where his craft stuck for days.

For the information of those unacquainted with river travel I will say that buoys are placed by the Government in dangerous parts of the river to point out the only safe channel. Now, whether or not the opposition was really guilty of this trick, Dan's verses gained him the sympathy of the people, and with that sympathy came their dollars. In fact, to such an extent did Dan work upon the sympathies of the people that, at many points, they actually refused to allow the opposition boats to land. At some of these places the opposition had themselves incurred the displeasure of the people by touching at the landing only long enough to receive their audiences, and then going into the middle of the river to give their performances, thus avoiding the payment of the license fee.

This lasted through the winter, and when summer came both shows took to their tents and traveled toward New York State. There Dan's enemies succeeded on some charge or other in getting him in jail. While in his cell he composed the song Blue Eagle Jail, in which he described the jailer, whom he disliked, as "Dot-and-Go-One," from the fact of his having a wooden leg. This song made the one-legged jailer notorious all over the country.

One thing I must say for Dan Rice: He was the only original clown I ever heard—with the single exception of Dilly Fay. The latter was an erratic individual who actually became a clown that he might save money to complete his studies in Paris. Fay was educated and original, but lacked the physical power and deep voice of Rice. I never heard of Fay after he started for Paris, but presume he never reentered the ring.

Tan-Bark Oratory and Harlequin Pluck

One time when I was with Dan Rice on the river circus we showed at Memphis. At this place a certain fellow was loud in his denunciation of Dan and the show. He was a source of great annoyance to the showman and had also made himself very unpopular by declaiming against slavery. In retaliation Dan entered the ring and returned the compliment in kind. He capped the climax by singing a song in which he described his enemy as playing cards with a negro on a log, and so boldly was this done that the people believed it and the fellow became so exasperated that he threatened to shoot Dan. The clown, however, defied him, and continued ridiculing him until the man was actually obliged to leave the city in a hurry.

Dan also had trouble at Yazoo City, Mississippi. He had, it appears, on a former visit, flogged a prominent man there, and the latter had sworn to shoot him on sight. One night when Dan was clowning in the ring the prominent citizen entered and drew his revolver to kill. A plucky bystander, however, knocked the iron from his hand and prevented bloodshed. The scene that followed I shall never forget. Dan stood undaunted in the ring, called the man a coward and dared him to shoot. His audience went into ecstasies over such an exhibition of bravery and applauded to the echo. Whereupon Dan, stimulated to further efforts, poured forth a torrent of the most stinging denunciation of cowards that ever fell from mortal lips. I have often wondered where Dan picked up such a command of language.

At that time he was not an educated man, although years after, when visiting him at his magnificent house at Girard, Pennsylvania, I found that he had a well-stocked private library, and he had certainly become an exceedingly well-read man.

An Imitation Patriot Shown Up

My last experience with Dan Rice when he was in the circus business was at Elkhart, Indiana. It was a very stormy day during the war. The weather was too windy to permit the hoisting of the usual flags, and one pompous young fellow, inflated with conceit, appointed himself a committee and visited Dan, demanding that the flags be hoisted. He charged that Dan had made secession speeches in the South. With an ugly mob at his heels the fellow declared that if the flags were not hoisted he would burn the whole outfit. Dan truthfully told the crowd that he had already erected, at Girard, Pennsylvania, a monument to the Union soldiers; that he owned more flags than the whole city of Elkhart, and that he would show them if they desired; but he absolutely refused to hoist a stitch of bunting upon such a demand. Threats and arguments were alike powerless to move him from his stand. I thought him rather foolish, in those exciting times, and there appeared to me great danger in his action.

Dan, however, mastered the situation. He publicly announced that at the night show he would give a full history of the leader of the mob, and did so with a vengeance. He had learned by careful inquiries something of the character of this fellow, who was a cashier in a bank, and at the evening performance, and in the actual presence of the man and his associates, Dan mounted a stool and gave his enemy such a verbal castigation as few persons have ever received. As he progressed in his speech he waxed eloquent, and in a marvelously deep, clear and penetrating voice pictured the vices and foibles of this "patriotic" cashier, until the audience was ready to mob the man. Suddenly a rush was made to where he had been sitting. But he was gone and the eloquent showman was a complete victor.

That night I roomed at the hotel where Rice was stopping and in the morning he accompanied me to the depot, to see me off for my home in the West. While waiting there the cashier appeared and begged Dan to retract his assertions of the night before, declaring that otherwise he would be run out of town. Dan replied that if he did not immediately leave him he would receive the worst thrashing of his life—and Dan would have kept his word, to the letter, had not the fellow beat a quick retreat. I saw Rice but once after that time, but always regarded him as a prince of the circus ring.

At one time we started our show through Kentucky, where we did a splendid business. On this journey through the South our horses were all caught in a fire and so charred and burned that we had to shoot many of them. In Mississippi we were greatly troubled and delayed by the muddy roads. We were three days going a distance of only eighteen miles. At one point, where there was only one house, our tent was delayed on account of the deep mud and we were forced to show without it, putting up the seats in the form of a circle, thus making a ring in which the performance was given. The people could see the performance without paying, but nearly all of them had principle enough to pay. A few ruffians, however, began abusing the showmen and a genuine fight ensued, which was a repetition of most of the others, and some of the toughs were badly hurt. Our men had all gone to the farmhouse to bed, and I was alone on the grounds to look after my property, when, after midnight, a crowd began to gather and suddenly surrounded me, shoving the muzzles of their pistols and guns in my face. This crowd hung about until daylight, and I pleaded so heartily that they did not shoot. The fact that I was then little more than a boy in years was, I think, the only reason I was not instantly shot by the ruffians.

When our company began to gather in the morning these ruffians left, but I shall never forget that night sitting there surrounded by a half-drunken mob, in a drizzling fall of rain. I was completely exhausted and half frozen, and never before nor since was I so glad to see daylight come.

This trip led us through Georgia, Alabama, Florida and North Carolina. In those States we frequently traveled at night, and sometimes all night, illuminating our way by setting fire to the patches of gum on the pine trees at the spots where they had been "blazed" for their sap. In the mountains of North Carolina we encountered the "clay eaters." I was assured that they subsisted to a great extent upon a certain kind of clay which appears to be able to sustain life. The reader can imagine the character and intelligence of these beings. There was also, in a certain region, a strange people who held regular monthly fairs where they met to barter. They were said to be descendants of a certain Scottish clan, who, when they first came to this country, were fairly well civilized, but instead of settling in the fertile soils and lowlands, took up their homes in the mountains, because the latter reminded them of their native country. Here they became more and more isolated until, at length, they were governed solely by their own outlandish laws and customs, knowing nothing of the usages of civilization. Outside of the clay-eating districts these mountain people grew to an enormous stature and possessed great strength. I found them very hospitable, always treating their guests with marked kindness.

rooms at the hotel and explained to them the situation. I proposed to pay them all off and let them remain idle until the opening in the following spring. To this all agreed save two, our principal riders, a woman and a man. These positively refused to make any compromise. The woman snapped her fingers in my face and said: "No, I was engaged for a year and you will have to pay me my salary just the same. You are able to do it, and do it you shall." The man took precisely the same stand, and as they were not only our star riders, but also the best equestrians in America, I was at a loss to know what to do.

I took a little time for deliberation and learned that both malcontents were very much in love with each other. This immediately helped me to determine what course to pursue. I first sent for the woman and told her to get ready at once to go to my farm in Wisconsin, where I intended to build a ring around a tree, to furnish her with a ringmaster, and to allow her to earn her salary by giving two performances daily to the birds and squirrels. She claimed that her contract did not call for such performances, but a reference to the contract proved that she was to ride in any part of America I might designate. Then I sent for the man and told him that he and his horses must take the next steamer for New York City. He refused to do this, but I quickly proved to him that his contract with us, though calling for transportation for himself and horses, did not specify of what nature that transportation should be: I had a perfect right to send him by sailing vessel if I chose. His refusal to go of course canceled his contract, and I accordingly left him. The woman expressed her willingness to go to Wisconsin, but I knew she could not leave her sweetheart—and I was right. In less than half an hour they proposed a compromise, but I refused. Finally I agreed to take the woman to New York and pay her half salary until the season opened.

Among the many men employed with the Barnum show was one large, handsome fellow who was superintendent of the equestrian department. As showmen are fond of having nicknames, some one called this man "Barnum." The poor fellow was wholly illiterate and tolerably fond of whiskey, consequently the name was decidedly inappropriate, but, as a nickname will, it stuck to him hard and fast. One day, while Mr. Barnum was visiting the show, his namesake was lying asleep outside one of the horse tents on a pile of hay, and one of the hands, desiring to waken him, shouted at the top of his voice: "Barnum! Barnum! Wake up!" Mr. Barnum had been a witness to this scene and he came to me in a tremendous rage, saying: "Have you no respect for me at all?"

"What do you mean, Mr. Barnum?"

"What do I mean?" he replied. "Why, I wish to know your intent in calling that drunken, illiterate brute by my name."

Of course, after an explanation, Mr. Barnum's rage cooled, but I think he was never so much annoyed in his life. It well illustrates how thoroughly he hated the vice of drunkenness. After that episode strict injunctions were given to refrain from calling the man "Barnum."

On one occasion when we had run to Joplin, Missouri, the train was divided into three sections, the first having been switched on a siding to wait for the other two. I was sitting at the hotel, eating breakfast, when the superintendent of the road came in and announced, "I am afraid you will not show to-day."

"Why not?" I replied.

"Well," said he, "the section of your train that has already pulled out has run wild down a steep grade over an immense trestle with nothing but zigzags and reverse curves. We have to run over them with our passenger trains at very slow speed, and, as your cars are top heavy, I can see nothing but complete destruction for them."

"Well," said I, "can't you send an engine after the runaway section?"

He promised to do this and, as there was nothing more I could do, I finished my breakfast at leisure.

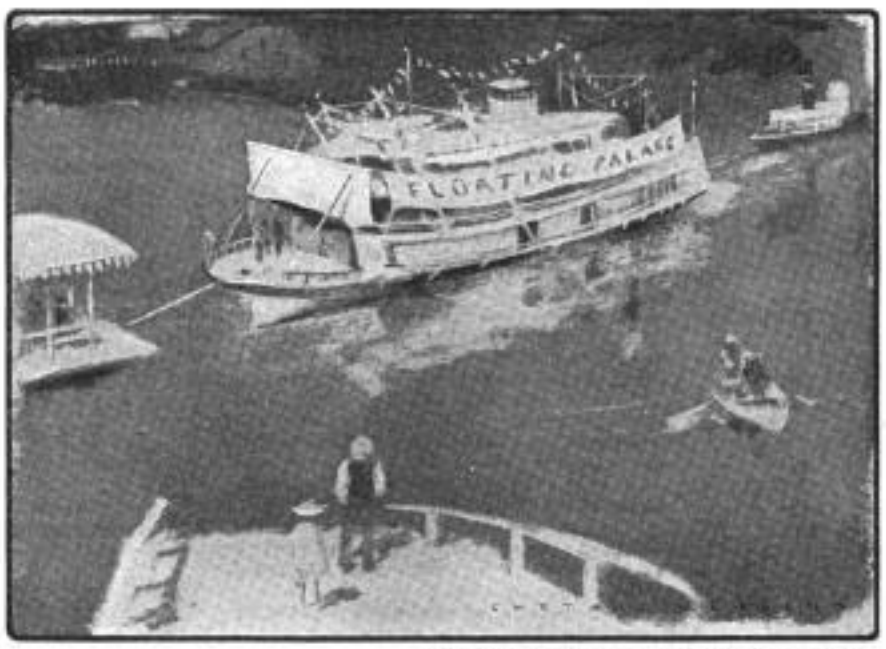
Barnum's One Unconquerable Superstition

The locomotive went out and caught the train. It had passed safely over the trestle and had reached a heavy ascending grade. Here it naturally lost its momentum and began to back down the grade toward the city. I was unaware, at that time, that a passenger train was then due and that the superintendent fully expected a collision to take place. I can assure my readers that I drew a long breath when the operator looked up from his key and remarked: "Thank the Lord! Number Six, the passenger, is an hour late!" Thus a dreadful catastrophe was prevented. Two men were asleep on one of the platform cars of the circus train, and one of them, in the stress of excitement, jumped off and was instantly dashed to pieces one hundred feet below. The man who stuck to the train was saved, although nearly frightened to death.

Mr. Barnum, although never particularly nervous about accidents, usually refused to travel in the same train with me, giving as his reason that should we both be killed the show would be without a head. Really he regarded me as something of a "hoodoo." In the course of one trip from New Orleans to New York we were compelled to ride together, and on that occasion the sleeper caught fire and was very nearly destroyed. Fortunately this happened in the daytime.

Not only was Mr. Barnum quick to grasp a situation, but was also ready at repartee. Once, at the hotel at Block Island, the dining-room was crowded with people from all over America. One of the guests was a somewhat notorious Mayor of a well-known Western city. During a partial lull in the conversation, this politician had the temerity to bawl out: "Barnum, what is going to be your next humbug? Your last one, the White Elephant, was a failure!" Mr. Barnum, in a voice equally loud and without a moment's hesitation, replied:

"I think my next humbug will be the present Mayor of your city! I have been twice Senator of my State and three times Mayor of Bridgeport; but from what I have learned of politicians and their methods in the West I have come to the conclusion that I am now in a far more respectable business—that of showman—in which no man is either corrupted or injured."



Without a doubt Mr. Barnum was one of the best-known men in the world. While in England I found plenty of quite intelligent people who imagined it was he who brought Moody and Sankey to their country. George Middleton, of dime museum fame, states that in sailing from Australia to Java he found in the limited ship's library Barnum's autobiography, and there, 9000 miles from home, where the English language is scarcely spoken, he saw passengers while away the time by reading the "Life of Barnum, Written by Himself."

One evening, during the run of our hippodrome in New York, we were honored by the presence of King Kalakaua, who, after visiting the state geologists and dining with A. T. Stewart, had expressed a wish to see our great institution. His Majesty was conducted through the menagerie in which nothing appeared to interest him except the elephants and the rhinoceros. Then he was taken to a box which I had caused to be specially prepared for him. I then took Mr. Barnum into the box and presented him to the king, who seemed delighted at the introduction, as he said he had read much about the world's greatest showman. Mr. Barnum remained some time in the royal box, explaining everything to his dusky Highness, who declared he had enjoyed his visit better than anything else since his arrival in America.

Kalakaua's Entry into the Show Business

At the conclusion of the "Fête of Pekin," a special fireworks piece which I had ordered purposely prepared, was ignited. Beneath the design appeared the words "King Kalakaua." At this the immense audience applauded to the echo, but His Majesty did not deign to notice the compliment, except by an uneasy movement. The next feature was a flat race which he evidently enjoyed hugely, becoming quite excited and presenting the young lady rider who won the contest with the flower he wore in his buttonhole. This graceful act was also applauded, but still His Majesty took no notice of the compliment. After the next race I arranged to have a few friends start a cry of "Kalakaua." This being well taken up by the audience, I had the handsome carriage, that was used to bring the performers from the dressing-room to the ring, driven rapidly in front of the box. Mr. Barnum, with a characteristic grasp of the situation, arose and led the king toward the carriage. His Majesty hesitated a moment but soon followed his host, and, entering the conveyance, they were soon driven rapidly around the track amid the tumultuous applause of the assembled thousands. Men, women and children arose to their feet, waving handkerchiefs, hats, umbrellas and canes. While this was the most popular reception the king had had, he did not seem particularly pleased with it, and he told me he did not expect to be made a show of. I answered that it was the demand of the people who had flocked there to see him, and that he was the magnet which had drawn them. At this he appeared satisfied. The following morning the papers teemed with elaborate descriptions of the dramatic episode.

Mr. Barnum by his prompt grasp of the situation had scored a great success. Under cover of a most flattering tribute to his guest he had really added another feature to his show, delighted the public and captured the press. It was an instance of the kind of greatness which distinguished him.

The "Palace" was simply a large boat fitted up as an opera house

Josiah and the Seventh Son

By Joe Lincoln

— whisked over the fence and disappeared in the cornfield

ENTERING the gate and passing by the front part of the house, where the blinds were never opened except on Sunday, I rapped at the back door. No one answered and, with the familiarity of old acquaintance, I opened the door and called, "Mrs. Ellis!"

Still there was no answer, and I was about to turn away when I became aware that curious sounds were proceeding from the barn at my back; sounds which might be produced by beating a carpet with a cane, supposing—which is rather improbable—that said carpet possessed a voice and howled dismally.

I turned toward the barn and, as I did so, out from its side door darted a coatless and disheveled boy of about fourteen years, who paused not at sight of me, but whisked over the fence and disappeared in the cornfield. In his wake, like a battleship pursuing a torpedo boat, lumbered a stout, red-faced woman with a switch in one hand and the jacket belonging to the fugitive in the other. She halted at the fence and gazed at the spot where the youngster had disappeared, with something like a smile gradually o'erspreading her plump, round face.

"He's getting too lively for you, Mrs. Ellis," I ventured. She started and, turning, saw me. "Land sakes! Is that you?" she exclaimed. "Yes, yes! he's gittin' too spry fer my short breath. I feel it's my duty, once in a while, ter give him what his father would if he was alive, but I sha'n't be able ter do it much longer, I cal'late."

"Josiah never appeared to me to be a bad boy," I said.

"He ain't reel bad. He's jest full of his mischievous notions and doin's. I stan' it long 's I kin and then I git out er patience and whale him, same's I was doin' jest now, 'fore he slipped his jacket and run."

"What was the particular prank this morning?" I inquired.

"Playin' he was 'Somebody, the Scalp Hunter,' and heavin' a wooden tommyhawk right through the open window and smashin' the best lookin'-glass. Sure sign er death, let alone the price of a new one! Books is what's the matter with him."

"Books, Mrs. Ellis?"

"Yes, books, story-books; he can't read one of 'em without actin' of it all out. One time he read somebody's travels in Afriky, and what did he do but dig a big hole out in the pastur', and cover it up with brush, and put dirt on top er that, so it looked jest like the rest er the grosnd. Our cow fell into it and had ter stay there all night 'fore he could dig a place fer her ter walk up. He told me he was playin' trappin' elephunts."

I laughed and Mrs. Ellis laughed with me.

"'Nother time," she continued, "he stuck a candle into his hat and rigged a double rope over the windlass and lowered himself down the well; playin' coal miner. When he got down there somehow er nother he couldn't make his histin' app'ratus work and he was purty nigh drownded and froze ter death when I found him and hauled him up. But the greatest thing he ever done, and one that reelly saved us all consider'ble, was when he ketched the Seventh Son."

"Caught which?"

"The Seventh Son. Set down on the bench out door here while I get cooled off, and I'll tell yer about it. I dunno whether it's 'cause he's so lively or 'cause I'm so fat, but thrashin' that boy alters gits me bilin' hot."

We seated ourselves on the wash-bench back of the kitchen.

"It come about by Josiah's readin' story-books, as I told you. This time 'twas detective stories, and partic'lar them 'bout some critter named Burdock Homes."

"Sherlock Holmes?" I suggested.

"That's the feller. Well, Josiah he read and read about him till he got ter be purty nigh crazy. He said this ere Burdock feller could jest look at a man and tell how old he was, and what his bus'ness was, how many children he had, what church he b'longed ter, an' anything yer wanted ter know.

"He had a notion that he was purty nigh as smart as Burdock himself. I come in one time and he looks me all over and he says, 'Ma,' he says, 'you've been makin' apple sass and yer tasted of it and it was too sour.'

"'How did yer find all that out?' I says.

"'I dedoosed it,' says he. 'There's a piece er apple peelin' on your dress, and when yer come in yer face was all puckered up.'

"'Well, your dedoosin' ain't good fer much,' I says, 'cause that apple peel fell outer some leavin's I was feedin' the pig, and I had my face puckered up 'cause I thought I wanted ter sneeze.'

"But you couldn't squelch him that way; he kep' up his dedoosin' and detective foolishness right along. When the Bearse house was broke into he was right on his uppers, as yer might say, and wished I'd let him be a detective and 'ferret out the crim'nals.' I told him I'd 'ferret' him with a barrel stave unless he quit his foolishness.

"Then he went ter work makin' the house burglar proof. He got a whole lot of old sleigh-bells and cow bells and rigged two or three of 'em up over each winder on wires, so's when yer shoved the winder up 'twould jiggle the bells and make a racket. Then he whittled out some wooden plugs ter fit the key-holes in the doors. Them was ter keep burglars from gittin' in with false keys—another book notion. Next thing he rummaged out all his ole muskrat traps and one ole fox trap somebody give him, and took ter settin' of 'em under all the winders at night; so's if a thief should git in he'd git caught, yer see. I never said nothin' against these contraptions; they was better'n coal-minin' down the well, anyhow.

"Well, about this time Uncle Elkanah and A'nt Tabithy come ter visit us. Uncle Elkanah, he's over eighty and is pretty shaky with the palsy and consider'ble childish. A'nt Tabby, she's 'bout ten years younger and is smart enough, only she's the greatest critter fer b'lievin' in fortune-tellin' and all that kind er rubbish that ever was.

"They'd been here a week or so when it come Circle day and the Sewin' Circle was ter meet down ter Miss Lurany Black's. I did want ter go, dreadful, 'cause Lurany 'd jest got back from a trip ter her brother's in Pennsylvany, and I wanted ter hear her tell about it. So A'nt Tabby, she says ter me, s'she, 'You go right along now, Mary Emma,' s'she; 'I'll look arter the house and cook the vittles. I'd jest as lief as not.'

"I didn't want ter go 'way and leave my comp'ny ter look arter themselves, but A'nt Tabby said she and Uncle Elkanah wa'n't comp'ny, and I must go sure; so I done so.

"We had a reel nice Circle meetin'; and Lurany had as good a supper 's ever I set down to. 'Twas after eight o'clock when I got home, and when I come in I see there was a stranger in the settin'-room. He was free and easy as yer please, settin' with his chair tipped back and his loigs crossed, and his tongue rattlin' like a hay cutter. A'nt Tabby and Josiah was settin' there with their mouths open listenin' ter him, and Uncle Elkanah's mouth was open, too, but 'twas 'cause he was asleep.

"I come in, and A'nt Tabby jumps up and says, 'Mary Emma,' says she, 'here's a gentleman I know yer'll be glad ter meet. This is Mrs. Ellis, Mr. Montmorency,' says she.

"The feller jumps up and makes a tremendous low bow. 'Ma'am,' he says, 'I am charmed ter make yer acquaintance.' I wa'n't particular charmed ter make his; I didn't like his looks a mite. He had on a shiny black coat, like a minister's, spotted up consider'ble and with pretty rusty-lookin' buttons on it. He had more'n an average dirty shirt with a glass diamond in the front of it, and his hair was black and curly and sorter greasy lookin'. He had a big black mustache curled up at the ends. Take him all tergether he looked ter me like a scalawag.

"I could see, though, that A'nt Tabby thought he was jest elegant. 'Mr. Montmorency's a Seventh Son,' says she, proud as all out door.

"'Seventh Son of a Seventh Son, if yer'll excuse the correction, ma'am,' says the man with another grand bow.

"'I think large fam'lies are reel nice,' says I, fer the sake of sayin' somethin'. I was wond'rin' all the time who the critter was and how he come ter be makin' so free of my settin'-room.

"'What business air you in, Mr. Montmorency?' I asks him, after a spell.

"'I am a seer, ma'am,' says he, and I noticed A'nt Tabby kinder puff up with importance when he said it.

"'Overseer?' I says.

"'Oh, no, ma'am. A seer, a prophet, a reader of the stars, an astrologist.'

"'Astrology must be awful interestin',' I says; 'they didn't uster study it when I went ter school. I s'pose you've got a tremenjous big telescope in your office?'

"'Pardon me, ma'am,' he says, 'but I think you still mistake me. I am not an astronomer; I am an astrologist, a reader of the future, one who pierces into the darkness surroundin' the things ter come.'

"'Oh!' I says, and I reckon my voice must have showed how disgusted I felt, 'a fortune-teller.'

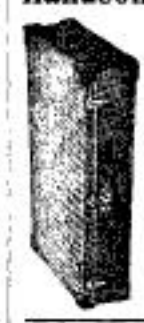
"The feller went off on a long gabble tellin' how his bus'ness was diff'rent, and lots superior ter common fortune-tellin', but I didn't pay much attention ter him. Soon 's ever I could I got A'nt Tabby out in the next room and asked her how he come ter be here. 'Twas jest as I thought. He'd come ter the door, and as soon as she found out he was a fortune-teller she'd asked him in. He told her a lot of stuff; said she was goin' ter be rich 'fore she died, and things like that, and she asked him ter supper. And that wa'n't the wust of it. She was so gone on him that she'd invited him, as 'twas quite a ways ter the hotel, ter stay ter my house over night.

"Well, I was upset! I couldn't say he shouldn't stay, because A'nt Tabby never'd forgive me, and, on t'other hand, I knew I shouldn't sleep a wink.

"The Seventh Son was full of his talk the rest of the evenin'. He looked at the palm er my hand and said I'd seen consider'ble trouble in my life and would see some more, but that I'd also seen consider'ble happiness and would see more er that, too. Well, I guess them things are true, so p'raps he wa'n't a fraud altogether.

"Finally, he went off ter the spare room ter bed, and Uncle Elkanah and A'nt Tabby went off ter their room. I locked up the house, and Josiah, he plugged up the key-holes, and seen ter his burglar alarms, and sot his traps same as usual.

"When I got inter my room I was wide-awake as could be. I laid and tried ter git ter sleep, but it wa'n't no use; all I could think of was that pesky Seventh Son, and listen and listen. I had my door open jest a grain, with a chair set against it, so I could hear if there was any noise in the house. I heard it strike 'leven, and twelve, and one, and then I reckon I dozed off a leetle.



"What waked me up was one of Josiah's burglar alarms a-jinglin'. It didn't jingle very loud ner long, but I was sleepin' so light that I heard it and riz right up in bed, with my heart goin' bumpety-bump.

"'Twas still fer a minute and then I heard the bell jingle again. I jumped outer bed and run ter the door er my room, and jest as I got there, there come a sorter thump, and then a-rattlin' and jinglin' and poundin', enough ter wake the dead. I was scart almost ter death, and, as I stood there tremblin', Josiah burst out er his room hollerin', 'I've got one! I've got one!' and went downstairs three steps at a time.

The Saturday Evening Post

JUNE-DAY PLANS FOR DOG-DAY READING

Summer resort reading is never the worse for a little city planning. Put it off until the last trunk is packed and the expressman is at the door, and the chances are that you are in for a holiday with ill-written railroad novels.

See what a little planning will procure for you.

During the past year the Editors of THE SATURDAY EVENING POST have received and examined thousands of manuscripts: Short stories, articles, serials, poems. A few hundred of these—the best of them—have been bought and illustrated for your warm-weather entertainment.

For $1.00 The Saturday Evening Post will be sent to your address for 21 weeks.

Mooswa of the Boundaries

By W. A. Fraser

Mr. W. A. Fraser has written for summer numbers of the magazine a series of most engaging stories of Rod, the Boy, and his friends, the fur-bearing animals of the Northwest. Mr. Fraser knows these dwellers of the forest better than most city folk know their next-door neighbors, and he introduces into his stories a vast mass of entertaining and little-known beast-lore. He explains why Umisk, the Beaver, sleeps with his tail in the water; the habits of Whiskey Jack (whose nest no man ever found); the misfortunes of the Red Widow, and how Pisew, the Lynx, went to the bad.

$3000 in Cash

To be given to 176 Persons

During this vacation you can earn $500, $250, $150, or any one of 173 other sums of money. These sums will be given to those persons who during leisure hours this summer solicit subscriptions and renewals for THE SATURDAY EVENING POST. They will be given in addition to an extremely liberal commission to be deducted from each subscription at the time of sending. It is within the power of any one who reads this notice to earn a large sum of money, the exact amount depending entirely upon the amount of time and energy devoted to the work. No matter how little is done, something will be earned. There will be 176 persons who will receive these special cash prizes, and your name may be included among the number just as well as not. If you are interested, send a line to THE SATURDAY EVENING POST Circulation Bureau for full details.

"Thinks I, 'That child will be murdered!'

"The noise come from the kitchen and was gittin' louder every minute. When I got ter the dinin'-room door, Josiah come tearin' outer the kitchen screamin', 'It's a burglar! He's caught in the winder and he's got one er my traps on his foot! Light a lamp, quick!'

"He lit one, himself, 'fore I could do anything. Honest and true, that young one wa'n't ha'f so scart as I was. I reelly b'lieve he'd been hopin' a burglar would come so's he could have the glory of catchin' him. He went inter the kitchen with the lamp and I follered him, and there was a sight!

"Stickin' out inter the room from the winder on the back er the house was the lower ha'f of a man. The rest of him was hangin' outside the winder and the sash was down tight on his back so he couldn't git out no further. He was in his stockin' feet and Josiah's big fox-trap was clamped on to one foot, with the chain and bells a-bangin' and jinglin'. I recognized them faded plaid pants; 'twas the Seventh Son!

"He was kickin' and fightin' ter git out, but that winder-sash had caught him right in the small er the back and held him solid. He roared fer me ter put up the winder and let him out, but, thinks I, 'I'll find out what yer was up ter, old man, 'fore I help yer.'

"I went and got my keys and unlocked the kitchen door, after pullin' out the plug, and looked out. The Seventh Son was pawin' the air, and when he see me, he told me ter come and help him out or he'd break my neck. I didn't pay no attention, fer, under the winder where he'd throwed 'em, I see his shoes and hat and a bundle. I went over and picked up the bundle and brought it in and opened it. The fust thing that fell out was my silver teaspoons.

"Them teaspoons was give ter me when I was married, and I wa'n't pleased ter see 'em so nigh ter bein' stole by a Seventh Son; so I didn't think no more about settin' him loose; fact is, I was thinkin' how I could keep him where he was. Just then A'nt Tabby and Uncle Elkanah come down, and when A'nt Tabby see the Seventh Son stuck in the winder and the bag er plunder on the table, down she flops in a swoon.

"Then, ter help things along, Uncle Elkanah, who 'tween his palsy and the scare was shakin' so he fairly rattled the winders, got his hand inter a sheet of sticky fly-paper on the table. Tryin' ter git it off that hand he got it on the other; then he got his long whiskers into it, and then, dancin' round so, he stuck his poor old bare foot inter one er Josiah's muskrat traps.

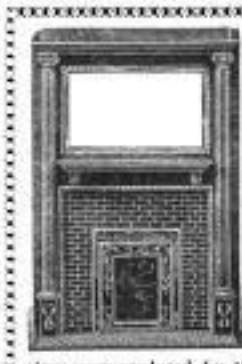
"I thought I should go ravin' distracted! The Seventh Son was kickin' frightful and swearin' at the top of his lungs. Sich language I never heard before ner sense. Uncle Elkanah was rollin' 'round the floor, all stuck up with fly-paper, hollerin', 'Take him off! Take him off!' havin' some kind er crazy notion that the trap was a dog that had holt of him. A'nt Tabby had swooned, and, take it all tergether, it beat my time.

"But Josiah, he was cool as could be, fer all I could see he was blazin' with excitement. 'That feller's kickin' so he'll git out,' he says, pointin' ter the Seventh Son; 'hold on a minute and I'll lassoo him.' Then he went and got a rope he called his lassoo. It had a slip-knot in it, and what does that young one do but git the slip-knot around the Seventh Son's shanks, and haul tight.

"The Seventh Son, he roared and raved louder'n ever and kep' haulin' up his laigs like a frog swimmin', but, fast as he hauled 'em up, Josiah'd haul 'em straight again. And then, thank goodness, Eben Baker and some er the neighbors come in, and they carried the Seventh Son off ter the lockup.

"The rascal had crep' downstairs from his room, and filled his bundle with all the stealable things in the house, and then, 'cause he couldn't open the doors, had tried ter git out the kitchen winder. This is an old house, and when yer want ter keep a winder open yer have ter prop it up with a stick. He done that, but he knocked the stick out climbin' through and the sash come down and ketched him jest right.

"A'nt Tabby come out of her swoon purty quick, and I wished yer'd seen the time we had with Uncle Elkanah. His whiskers was all tangled up in the fly-paper and it pulled dreadful gittin' 'em free. His toes was sore, and his head was so muddled up that he ain't quite right yit, I b'lieve."



Mrs. Ellis paused, and I wiped away the tears of laughter from my cheeks.

"What became of the Seventh Son?" I inquired.

"Oh, he got five years!" was the answer. "And Josiah was so puffed up because 'twas his notions that ketched him, that he haint got over it, even now. That's why I have ter dust him once in a while, same 's I was doin' this mornin'."

Literary Folk — Their Ways and Their Work

READERS of No. 5 John Street were alarmed to hear last spring that Mr. Richard Whiteing was suffering from a sharp attack of double pneumonia. Now that he is out of danger the way he fell ill is worth telling, illustrating as it does his unfailing energy in getting to the bottom of everything about which he means to write. His next novel is to treat of country life in much the same searching manner in which his last book discussed the London slums, and in order to obtain the necessary local color Mr. Whiteing took up his abode in an ordinary workman's cottage in a pretty little village known as Chalfont St. Giles, in Hertfordshire. Here the bad food and bad drainage alike combined to make him fall ill, and a chill soon brought on pneumonia. Fortunately his friends managed to move him up to his London house, where a constant stream of anxious callers testified to his universal popularity. It is a comment on the way in which the English agricultural laborer lives that one should be able to escape unhurt from a sojourn in the East End of London and yet fall a victim to worse dangers in the country—a comment that will, no doubt, be made in Mr. Whiteing's new book when he is well enough to write it. At present he is only well enough to grumble at his forced inaction.

An amusing little incident told of him the other day, when his illness was almost at its height, illustrates his aptitude for turning a neat phrase at all times. Referring to one of the admirable nurses who have helped him to recovery without letting him have a glimpse of any personality beyond that of their calling, he remarked that she had "achieved an artistic perfection in being a nobody."

Mrs. Bigelow's Friday Afternoons

Mr. and Mrs. Poultney Bigelow not only make their house a rendezvous for young Americans who come to London, and who would find it a lonely place except for Mrs. Bigelow's Friday afternoons, but they also fill it with interesting and distinguished English folk. They are patriotic Americans, yet when the news came to London of the relief of Ladysmith the British flag was hung out so promptly in front of their house that some of the neighbors came in afterward to inquire whether they had had special news. The Bigelows' flag announced the tidings to the street before the extra editions of the newspapers.

Although Mrs. Bigelow is said to have a novel or so up her sleeve she is better known as a personality than as a writer. In literary circles she has the reputation of being one of the wittiest women in London. A short time ago she was staying in a country house with a typically British party. For two days she sparkled on. One of the guests tried a little word-fencing with Mrs. Bigelow but found himself no match for the repartee which came with such lightning-like rapidity. Finally he confessed to his hostess: "She's the most amusing woman I have ever seen, but, if American women are all like that, country houses ought to be arranged with placards of 'Silence' hung in certain rooms where the men could take to cover."

The Best Company of London

There may be houses in London where you will meet more distinguished literary men and women than at Lady Jeune's; others where you would find more powerful members of the Government; others, perhaps, where you might count on seeing more painters, or sculptors, or distinguished soldiers, or actors and actresses, or playwrights, or scientists, or celebrated travelers, or smart people and dukes and duchesses. But it is probable that the spacious old house in Harley Street where Sir Francis and Lady Jeune live, which receives into its hospitable doors some of all these classes, holds better company than any other house of the present time.

Lady Jeune's list of acquaintances is simply enormous; you can find a good part of it by looking through Who's Who, although that is not enough. Lady Jeune's theory is not the one so often held that one must choose and pick among one's acquaintances to find congenial spirits. Any one who is her guest is expected to be able to meet and to talk with any other guest. So the literary man does not talk shop with other literary men, but broadens his views.

Lady Jeune may not be called the busiest woman in London, but it is because she never seems in a hurry—not even if she has written an article after breakfast, has been to the East End to distribute relief to soldiers' wives and widows in Hackney, looked in on Sir Thomas Lipton's model restaurant for the poor in Commercial Road, has had a luncheon party in Harley Street, has attended a meeting of the executive council of the Women's Exhibition at Earl's Court, has paid three visits and is preparing to dine out, go to the theatre and then on to two parties. That would be an average day in the season. The next day would be quite different but just as busy.

Mr. Morrison's East End Studies

Mr. Arthur Morrison is not, perhaps, quite so well known in America as he is in England. But if, in London, you ask any literary person who has done "the real thing" about the slums of the East End he will answer instantly, "Morrison."

Recently, with much ceremony and the presence of the Prince of Wales, a large block of model dwellings was opened on the site of what used to be the worst slums in Shoreditch, and the Prince and all the other speakers spoke of the spot as "the Jago," and referred to Mr. Morrison's A Child of the Jago as the almost classic record of what the horrors of slum life might be. Indeed, the new model dwellings were exactly on the site of the district which was accurately depicted in that novel.

People who like the author's life to correspond in some way to the matter of his books may expect to hear that Mr. Morrison still prowls about the slums. If he does so nowadays it is surely only in search of antique furniture shops. He lives in the little village of Loughton and his walks are in the Epping Forest. He will talk to the visitor of life in London, if the visitor wishes, but he would much rather have as a topic his special hobby, Japanese art. Let Mr. Morrison start on the subject of Japanese painters and he will carry you from luncheon through teatime up to dinner, illustrating what he says by showing you his superb collection, one of the finest owned by any private individual in the world. The collection is constantly growing; its owner has an agent in Tokyo, and he knows every dealer in England.

He also knows every furniture dealer in London. But a small house forbids one's constantly buying furniture, and when Mr. Morrison discovers a fine piece which cannot go in the house at Loughton he gives some friend of his a tip. As with all collectors, the pleasure of discovering treasures is with him almost as great as that of owning them.

The mania for collecting is infectious. Mrs. Morrison collects Japanese embroideries, and little Master Morrison, aged something like eight or nine, has also his own special, though rather miscellaneous, Japanese collection.

Mr. Morrison's next novel, which is the result of long and careful study, will be a picture of life in a small Essex village forty years ago. The chief character is a local wizard. This person really existed and was feared by all the countryside. Mr. Morrison has come into possession of all his papers, journals, etc. The book will be a most curious one.

The Commodore's Discomfiture

Arthur Brentano, the publisher and bibliophile of New York and Paris, is an enthusiastic lover of aquatic sports. He was one of the founders of the American Canoe Association, and for a long time was Commodore of the Knickerbocker Canoe Club.

"My election to this high maritime office," says Mr. Brentano, "was of great practical utility because it induced me to learn how to swim. We were camping out at Canoe Island, Lake George, and agreed to attend some races to be held four miles away. Bright and early on the appointed day the fleet started. As I was Commodore I thought a single mast and sail were unworthy the dignity of my office and indulged in the unfamiliar rig of two masts and sails. I was dressed with great care for the occasion, and, as the wind was not favorable, I ballasted my craft with some boulders I picked up on the beach. I started a thing of beauty, but before I had gone a mile there came a wind which jammed the boom into the side of the canoe and threw the boat upon her beam ends. I went gracefully, though involuntarily, into the water and found that my feet had become entangled in the rigging. I worked myself loose and managed to get a good hold upon the side of the canoe. It was impossible to right the boat, so I tried to propel it by vigorous kicking. This proving too laborious I removed piece by piece most of my clothing and of course lost them. Finally, to my shame, I was rescued by some friends who had seen my predicament afar off and had come after me in a plebeian scow. As we reached shore I saw a number of young ladies who had come from the various fashionable hotels to witness the race. After many difficulties I secured a coat made for a man twice my width and a pair of trousers of another who was six feet tall. I made my toilet by rolling up the legs of the latter and by folding over the front breadths of the former. When I stepped ashore my reception was unique. The men cheered me and the young women, first preserving a polite silence, broke out into unpleasant laughter. The climax was reached when a late arrival, after looking at me critically, remarked, 'What an extraordinarily picturesque tramp!' The next day I took my first swimming lesson."

Oddities and Novelties of Every-Day Science

The Lost Sense of Direction

That civilized man has lost a sixth sense, which his remote and savage ancestors possessed, is the recently published theory of a French scientist named Reynaud. It is the sense of direction—the faculty which enables animals to find their way—and it is located, according to this authority, in the semi-circular canals of the inner ear. These are three little passages, found in man and other vertebrates, which are filled with a fluid called endolymph. Any injury done to their structure by accident or disease, as has been proved by many experiments, impairs the power. They have nothing whatever to do with hearing, but are "associated with equilibrium," and to "furnish images of movement and displacement in space."

Thanks to this organ, animals are able to retrace, with an accuracy that seems marvelous, routes over which they have once passed. The lost dog goes back invariably to the place where it last saw its master. The horse, in like manner, when the reins are loosed on its neck, finds its way to the stable with the constancy of the magnetic needle turning to the pole. A pigeon, carried by rail in a closed basket for hundreds of miles, and then liberated, will go back to the starting point, not by the shortest path, but following the line of the railroad. The same swallows come every year to the same nests.

When the time for departure comes, migratory birds of the same species inhabiting the same region come together for the journey, and those which have already made the voyage take the lead, retracing the path by which they came a few months before. The young ones follow. In the same way migrations of fishes are accomplished, and knowledge of the routes invariably pursued by the finny schools is of very practical value to the fishermen. Cormorants and other fishing birds follow for months the tracks of the migratory fishes, and know how to get back to their homes when the fishing is over. Like the fish and the quadruped, the bird returns to the same point by the same route.

The animal, whether aquatic, aerial or terrestrial, according to Doctor Reynaud's theory, "carries the way back with it." Nor, in his opinion, is man without a remnant of this interesting sixth sense, which, he asserts, is found in a greater or less degree in many savages. But it is not properly to be regarded as a phase of intelligence, being most highly developed in those races which are lowest in the scale of humanity.

The Age of Portable Novelties

This is an age of portable conveniences, in which a man is able to carry with him, in condensed form, his house, his boat, his food supplies for a long period, or what not. Even steamboats and bridges are turned out in sections, so as to be easily transported. But the latest invention in this line is a complete photographic dark room, which is collapsible, so that one may pack it in small compass and conveniently carry it in one hand by a strap when one goes traveling.

This contrivance, which has been newly patented by two citizens of Wisconsin, enables a photographer to develop and finish pictures outdoors or wherever he may happen to be. All he has to do is to unfold the apparatus and get inside of it, and immediately he has a dark room complete in all respects for his work. It is provided with every necessary convenience, having a window of ruby glass, a light-tight receptacle for the temporary storage of undeveloped plates, a developer-tray suspended by hooks, and a "hypo" tray similarly secured. In short, the device is excellently adapted to supplement the portable camera, enabling the amateur to carry with him a complete and businesslike outfit for the production of photographs from start to finish.

Meanwhile, an ingenious citizen of Washington, D. C., has succeeded in reducing the ever-necessary typewriter to a size that fits the pocket. By an ingenious arrangement of types, the tiny machine is able to print 324 different letters and symbols, so that, when desired, it can be made to record shorthand, as well as longhand, characters. Provided with one of these little instruments, the stenographer will find his work vastly facilitated, and the beginner in the art will be relieved to a great extent of what hitherto has been his main trouble—namely, the difficulty of deciphering his own notes.

The Government and the Lobster

Congress has just appropriated the sum of $7000 to pay for an investigation of the lobster. The trouble with him is that he is getting scarcer and scarcer every year, and, unless something is done about it, it is obvious that he will soon become practically extinct, so far as any commercial usefulness on his part is concerned. What the Government wants to know is the reason why lobsters are diminishing in numbers, and what measures may be taken to put a stop to the mischief.

It is extremely fortunate that means have been found for augmenting the lobster tribe by artificial breeding, though as yet it is too soon to decide how far this plan is likely to be successful in maintaining or increasing the species numerically, inasmuch as the hatching of young lobsters by the incubator method has been conducted on a large scale for only six years, and sufficient time has not elapsed to give the work a chance to show marked results. Nevertheless, it seems to be telling, for fishermen along the New England coast declare that they have never seen so many small lobsters, five or six inches long, as are now being taken in their traps.

During the last five years more than five hundred million baby lobsters were hatched by the Fish Commission and "planted" in New England waters.

The cost of hatching and planting one hundred million young lobsters is about $10,000. Regular market prices are paid for the brood females to the fishermen, who are forbidden by law to sell the animals to ordinary purchasers when in that condition. However, the fishermen, who are not usually restrained by legal regulations on such subjects, readily convert the breeding lobsters into marketable ones by scraping the eggs off the swimmerets with a spoon or a woolen mitten. The egg-bearing females, when stripped by the Fish Commission people, are returned by them to the sea, thus doubly aiding the fishery.

Luckily, it is the easiest thing in the world to hatch lobsters. The eggs, taken from the swimmerets of the mother, can be incubated in an ordinary glass jar full of sea-water, if the latter is kept fresh. A better method is adopted by the Fish Commission, and it is one of extreme simplicity. The loss in hatching, too, is very small, inasmuch as the eggs are not easily injured, and every one of them is already fertilized. They do not have to be impregnated artificially, as do shad eggs. The one hundred and nine million infant lobsters contributed to the vasty deep last summer were obtained from only one hundred and twenty-two million eggs—a loss of less than ten per cent.

If young lobsters could be kept in captivity for only a few weeks after hatching, as is done with many fishes that are artificially incubated, such as the shad, the coastal waters of the United States might soon be made to swarm with these useful animals. Unhappily, no way of accomplishing this has been found as yet. The baby crustaceans are scarcely forty-eight hours old before they begin to eat each other, and no amount of toothsome provender supplied to them will persuade them to restrain their cannibalistic propensity. Also, they are attacked by epidemics which carry them off by wholesale. Consequently, it is necessary to dump them into the ocean shallows when they are only a day old and leave them to take care of themselves.

A HERO of the NORTH-WEST

St. Andrew Church, to which Mah-dwa-go-nent and his tribe went in a body

The late Bishop Gilbert at his Idaho ranch

FROM the hour when he was obliged to leave Hobart College, stricken with a hemorrhage of the lungs, through all the years until, but a short time since, he yielded to a third attack of pneumonia, Bishop Mahlon N. Gilbert, coadjutor with Bishop Whipple of the diocese of Minnesota, had fought out many a hand-to-hand battle with death.

Years ago, when but just out of divinity halls, he was given a charge by Bishop Tuttle, his lifelong friend. It was the most difficult field in the West. Young Gilbert was the only minister of his faith in all the western half of a great territory. In the town of Deer Lodge, Montana, his headquarters, comprising some six hundred souls, he had at the beginning of his work but two communicants. It was from this town that he went upon mission tours throughout the region. He determined to build a church. Walking into the local bank one day, he said to one of the officials:

"I want two thousand dollars, without any indorsement, to be paid back some time in the future."

The banker looked at the young rector a moment, and then without a sign of further hesitation he said:

"You can have it! Any man that's got nerve enough to ask such a thing deserves to have it, and you shall have it without interest."

A very profitable church fair, held later, was liberally patronized, and soon after the proudest man in Montana, as he afterward said, marched into the bank and laid down the two thousand dollars in coin and currency.

The Bishop and the Gamblers In those days gamblers of the old school were numerous. They were gamblers to the core, in so far as the sin of gaming, but most of them played on the square and kept their pledges man to man. They knew the young rector for a manly man who hit out from the shoulder without mercy but who never struck below the belt. They were very much interested in the progress of the new church, and finally one of their number, delegated by the rest, handed the rector eighteen hundred dollars "for the new gospel mill."

The rector accepted the gift in the spirit in which it was proffered.

For a year after he began work in Montana he never saw a brother minister. Later, when he went to Helena to preach, the frontier was fast beginning to lose somewhat of its roughness.

A few days before Mr. Gilbert left Butte for Helena—he had for some time been stationed in Butte—a rough-looking man came up to him on the street and handed him two hundred and fifty dollars.

"Where did you get that?"

"Well," he replied, "this is the way it was. I knew you were going away, so I went down to one of the houses and I said to the boys, 'Boys, parson is going away to see his gal.' 'What parson is that?' asked one of the boys. 'Parson Gilbert,' I said. Well, sir, he just reached out, wiped the stakes off the board and said, 'Here, take that; he married me, and he did me the best turn I ever had.' That's how I got the money."

A heavy sea was running on one of the large lakes in the wilderness of northern Minnesota. Bishop Gilbert—for this was after his consecration and when he had taken up the mission work, so long followed by Bishop Whipple—had come hundreds of miles through the forest on his tour of the reservations, and had promised to be on the farther side of this lake on the following day to confirm a large class of Chippewa Indian converts.

An Object-Lesson in Faith Two silent Indians stood by his side and with them was another white man, a member of the party. The Indians looked out on the lake, too, and said through the interpreter: They would not attempt to cross the lake in their birch bark canoe in such a storm; it was death to do it.

The Bishop, through the interpreter, used all manner of arguments for a long time in vain, but when, at last, he told them he must go whether they did or not, something in the indomitable will of the man conquered the Indian in them and they set out. The Indians bent to their work. They spoke no word of any sort during the entire night, for the canoe was tossed on the waves, a cockle shell, from the hour of starting until the next morning.

It was a miracle, as I think the Bishop was willing to own, that the canoe was not swamped, and, indeed, he afterward said that, long before the gray dawn came, he had given up all hope. As soon as they were safely ashore and the confirmation services were about to begin one of the Indians asked that he might be confirmed, too. He wished to own allegiance to the Great Spirit of such a man, a Great Spirit that would hold him in safety through such a storm.

Once when the Bishop was engaged in a tour of the reservations a curious incident occurred. An entire nation, perhaps the first time in the history of the Christian church, came into the church in a body. The chief of the tribe, or nation, as it really was, Mah-dwa-go-nent, "The Man who Stands before his People," had absolute control over the tribe. He had been listening to the voices in the tops of the great pines, telling him he should accept the white man's God. None of his people would unite with any church without him. He decided one day it was his duty to follow the voices; so, together with all the tribe, men, women and children, they came to the Bishop for confirmation.

The Bishop's Life of Adventure During the tours of the forest regions of Minnesota the Bishop was exposed to dangers and to hardship. He traveled hundreds of miles in canoes, for there are elaborate chains of lakes and rivers in the region, the canoe journey often broken by portaging, when, should the region be swampy, the Bishop not infrequently was carried on the broad back of an Indian guide. Should it be in the fishing season he would have his trustiest tackle along, for no man was fonder of the catching of trout. In some of the northern streams the trout grow to prodigious size, and the Bishop was as deft above the laughing face of a swift brown stream in the forest as he was when he made a cast across the pews of the costliest church.

Some years ago Bishop Gilbert was enabled to buy a small ranch in Idaho, and here he enjoyed to the utmost the freedom and the activities of an out-of-door life, a life which, as a foil to his intense ecclesiastical life, strongly appealed to him.

Poverty No Bar to a Public Career

By John J. Ingalls

ALMOST distinguished lawyer and eloquent statesman not long since, in an address to the graduating class of one of our great universities, advised young men to take no active interest in politics till by business or professional activity they had secured competence or fortune sufficient to make them independent of party vicissitudes.

No doubt he was patriotic, and meant well, but no instruction could be more deleterious to democratic institutions. To confine political functions to the rich, or even to the well-to-do, would develop the most intolerable of all forms of despotism.

In practice it would have deprived our history of many of its most luminous and inspiring examples.

To proud, ambitious and sensitive spirits there is undoubtedly something of humiliation in accepting hospitality that cannot be returned. Sumptuous entertainments, splendid equipages and costly raiment, luxurious palaces and lordly expenditures have power and fascination that can be neither denied nor ignored. Added to high rank and station they give their possessor an importance and influence in legislation, diplomacy and statecraft much greater than that to which he might be entitled by his intellectual gifts and attainments. The club, the salon and the boudoir have quite as much to do with the policy of nations as the consultations of committee-rooms and the contentions of the floor.

The Money Factor in Our Politics

There is no magic at once so subtle and so potential as that of wealth. To multitudes no acquisition is so alluring as a great bank account. But our greatest civil and military leaders have not been favored by birth or fortune. Washington, to be sure, was the richest man of his time, but the situation is changed. Political millionaires are under the ban. They are suspected. Their attitude is apologetic and exculpatory. They are on the defensive. It would be easier for the camel to go through the eye of the needle than for the richest man in the country to become President to-day. The very fact of his wealth would render him ineligible. The plutocrat may now and then buy a cheap Legislature, or a convention that is on the bargain counter, but he never escapes detection and contempt.

The Romans had a proverb, "Obolus non olet"—money does not stink; but in American politics money accepted for a vote does stink, and Senates and constituencies hold their noses and call for disinfectants when the bribe-giver or the bribe-taker passes by.

Had the precepts inculcated by the orator to whom I have referred been the law of our society; had the competent and the aspiring waited for fortune before soliciting the suffrages of the people, all the great names of our recent annals would have been written on the roll of common men. Those who have made the history of the past half century have entered at the straight gate. I do not now recall one who was born with the traditional silver spoon in his mouth; who had a pedigree and a coat-of-arms and lay in the roses and lilies of life.

A Roll of Poor Boys Who Became Great Statesmen

The story of the ancestry of Lincoln, of the revolting hardships and privations of his childhood and youth, of his squalid environment, almost shock the sense of natural justice. We feel instinctively that destiny was unnecessarily cruel, harsh and severe. His great spirit bore the deep scars of those early struggles to the grave. Scarcely any man in the country had a past more depressing, or a future more hopelessly gloomy, desperate and unpromising than Grant at the outbreak of the Civil War. Henry Wilson, the "Shoemaker of Natick," Senator and Vice-President, was born in a vagrant community of basket-makers and tinkers, of unknown paternity. His real name was Jeremiah Colbath, and he took the patronymic of his patron, General Wilson, who, discerning the waif's powers, set him in the pathway of preferment and renown. Morton, the War Governor and Senator from Indiana, told me the proudest moment of his life, up to the age of twenty-one, was when he marched into his native village at the head of a band, playing a key bugle, while he was a hatter's apprentice. Garfield and Sheridan, the barefoot boys upon the towpaths of the Ohio canals; Andrew Johnson, the tailor; Blaine, the country school teacher; McKinley and Bryan, of humble origin—these and many others of smaller fame refute the instruction that the ambitious youth must put money in his purse before entering public life.

Another remarkable illustration is afforded by the life and career of Samuel Jackson Randall, of Pennsylvania, whose extraordinary qualities and achievements should have given him more conspicuous renown, but whose fading fame gives new pathos to Jefferson's mournful ejaculation, "So soon forgotten when we are gone!" He died in possession of an estate valued at less than $1000 after thirty years spent in municipal, State and national legislation.

His poverty was not specially creditable to him, for there is no reason why a Representative in Congress should not saw wood in vacation, practice law, buy and sell real estate, build houses, deliver lectures, write newspaper articles, and earn money in any legitimate and honorable calling; but it shows that there is no incompatibility between the narrowest simplicity of life, the most rigid economy in personal expenditure, and the highest success in public affairs.

Randall's career was coincident with the epoch of profligate profusion and extravagance that followed the war, that carnival of venality, the paradise of the parvenu, the boodler and the thief. The Credit Mobilier, office and pardon brokerage, whiskey rings, pension syndicates, sprang like toadstools from national decay. An obscene brood of harpies hovered over every department of Government. Great names were blighted. Honored reputations were blasted. The weak yielded to temptation. The needy fell into the pit. It was an epidemic of moral typhus, whose fatal contagion swept the innocent with the guilty to the hospital and the grave.

No tainted breath dimmed the bright mirror of Randall's reputation. Twice Speaker, acknowledged leader of the House, and chairman of the most important committee, he had opportunities for illicit gains beyond the dreams of avarice. But he lived modestly within his salary and by personal example not less than by legislative work rendered inestimable service to his State and the country. Whether such a career "paid" in the commercial sense would be a miserable interrogatory. Its equivalents were ample and will endure forever.

The compensations of political life, indeed, are not a matter of wages, profits and bookkeeping. They are not measured by income or per centum. It must be admitted that there are vicissitudes and misfits, but calamities attend all enterprises. Those who fail outnumber those who succeed. One is taken and the other left. Popularity and public favor sometimes seem capricious and fickle. The idol of yesterday is execrated to-morrow. The constituency of Aristides still survives, and Nemesis yet waits to resent and punish prosperity. Princes are not uniformly grateful, and the demands upon the time and strength of the public servant are not always considerate. The lamentation of Wolsey has not lost its pathetic significance, and the injunction to throw away ambition yet falls on wounded and weary souls. But the rewards of public life are far in excess of its burdens. The people are not always slow to anger, but in the end they are both just and generous to those who serve them with fidelity.

They honor courage, independent thought, manhood and truth, and are quick to forgive errors that proceed from an intrepid spirit. The ingratitude of republics is a stale proverb.

Strange Bed-Fellows Made by Politics

There are some scurvy companionships and occasional familiarities that are intolerable and not to be endured. The heeler and the fixer and the hummer cannot always be kicked downstairs. The man with the pull must be cultivated. Now and then relationships that in private life would be ignored must be submitted to with smiling complacence. If there be a doubtful remnant, an ignorant, detached, floating, debauched contingent, it must be taken into the account and dealt with, for if one party omits to secure it, the other will not, and this element may determine defeat or triumph. The statesman, the diplomatist and the commander who rely exclusively upon the Decalogue, the Golden Rule and the Thirty-nine Articles for success may retain the approval of conscience, but their adversaries will secure about everything else.

In the main, the associations and activities of public life are elevating and ennobling. The traditional frontier notion that the successful politician must be a voluble, swaggering, greasy demagogue, half horse and half alligator, has died out. The hayseed epoch is over. The day of the statesman who pledges his constituents that he will never wear evening dress or ride in a carriage has ended. Ben Butler, who knew human nature well, addressed the slums of Boston in full dress with a rose in his buttonhole on the theory that these children of the wharves wanted their representative not to be outshone by the aristocrats of Beacon Hill. Sunset Cox never forgot his manners nor his learning, though he had many supporters who cared little for either. It is an error long since outgrown to suppose that to become a politician the citizen must cease to be a scholar or a gentleman.

The "Shoemaker of Natick"

Politics, the active participation in public affairs, has been the favorite pursuit of men of energy, genius and ambition in every age. That it is honorable, as well as essential to the perpetuation of democracies, must be admitted. But whether political life as a vocation is desirable is quite another question. It depends, among other things, largely on temperament. Probably it would be just to say that the existing conditions of public life are not wholly favorable to happiness and are becoming less so. The obstacles are increasing rather than diminishing. Constituencies are more exacting. The telegraph and the daily newspaper impose increasing burdens. Time was when the candidate could start out on horseback and canvass an entire State with one speech. He cannot do it now.

Competition is more formidable, and money is becoming an indispensable factor, not in the corrupt way, but for the legitimate expenses of campaigns: for literature, handbills, music, headquarters, speakers, scrutiny of poll lists, traveling expenses, preliminary count of voters, and the cost of bringing the infirm and the indifferent to the booths on election day. But as these are largely shared and borne by contributions, financial considerations need not preclude the poorest from public life.

The Rarity of Great Men in Politics

It was formerly one of the favorite calumnies of our political incendiaries to stigmatize the public service as accessible only to the rich, and though there are some who occupy exalted stations merely because they have money, a very large fraction of those in public employment, much more than the majority, have no income but their salaries.

The pay of Senators and Representatives seems meagre compared with the earnings of corporation lawyers, railroad and insurance presidents, and prosperous merchants, but it is ample for decent support, and in most instances exceeds any income previously received from private pursuits.

Great men are as rare in politics as they are elsewhere, and are no more needed there than elsewhere. The main part of government is plain, practical business, and requires the same traits, faculties and methods as a great manufacturing or commercial enterprise. But the field is broader and the opportunities are more alluring. Government affairs concern every citizen, and the legislator with novel and forcible ideas, which he expresses in original and striking language, has an assured audience of as many millions as there are voters in the Republic. The bulk of our legislators and magistrates are men of fair average, every-day capacity, who would be content with the revenues of the leading attorney at the county seat or the teacher of languages or the principal tradesman in a country town.

To the ambitious and aspiring this is the inner secret of the irresistible fascination of public life—the consciousness of taking part in the great events which are of transcendent interest to mankind. There is no stage from which the voice of the actor penetrates so far, or where the response is so instantaneous from unknown multitudes as Congress or the "stump."

It might, perhaps, be of greater advantage in some directions if our system permitted the preparation of men for legislation, diplomacy and administration by the study of history, political economy, constitutional and international law, as they are now instructed and trained for service in the Army and Navy at West Point and Annapolis. But this is not practicable, and so long as our plan of party government continues, politics must be an episode rather than a pursuit.

It would, perhaps, be within bounds to say that the Speaker and twenty Representatives in each Congress have been the responsible architects and builders of our legislative fabric since the war. In the Senate, for obvious reasons, the proportion of influential participants is greater, but even here it is less than the majority.

Marked and conspicuous success is, therefore, no more to be taken into account in politics than in any other occupation. Those who succeed greatly in business, at the bar, in the pulpit, in speculation are the exceptions. Many are called, but few are chosen.

Office-Holding the Citizen's Duty

The corollary of suffrage is office—legislative, executive, judicial. One is the complement of the other. Both are indispensable components of the system. As there are voters, so there must be magistrates, law makers, judges. It is as much the duty of the good citizen to hold office as to cast the ballot. It is the same class who neglect their primary political obligations and are fatigued with freedom, who sneer and scoff at "office-seekers" as if the desire to enter the public service were an offense involving turpitude and moral degradation. These pseudo-reformers, who have a contempt for self-government and at heart are monarchists, stigmatize all aspirants for public employment as spoilsmen and place-hunters, and then expatriate themselves. Office-holding is like serving on the jury, or in the army and navy in time of war. It is a duty, an obligation which the State demands of its citizens, since it can be performed by no one else. It should be honorable and desirable, as without it the State would perish. In no other way can its functions be carried on, and it is therefore to be deplored that, instead of being serious and defined in their province, political careers are so random, helter-skelter and uncertain that they appear in common thought to combine the tinsel bombast of the stage, the fever of the gaming-table and the desperate hazard of battle.

Grave, calm and tranquil natures that love method and the orderly sequences of life, preferring the steady profits of trade to the glittering chances of faro and roulette, place politics in the same category with poker and pugilism. So that to describe a man as a politician is to many a disparagement implying taint, disrepute and stain. This is lamentable and unjust. Instead of being a stigma it should be a decoration and ornament. The degradation of politics is impossible without the degradation of the people.

The press and the platform resound with denunciation of bad government in the United States. There is much declamation against corruption in Congress, municipal boodleism, ring rule, legislation for monopolies, bosses, plutocrats, trusts and corporations.

Much of this clamor is manufactured by ignorant and dishonest demagogues, and is both sinister and insincere.

But were it true in terms, the appropriate answer would be that the people are supreme and have just as good government as they desire or deserve. If taxes are excessive, revenues squandered, and fools and knaves occupy high places, the people are to blame.

If a legislator sells his vote, the constituency that elected him is primarily at fault. If a mute and stolid millionaire sits dumbly in the Senate, speechless save at the roll-call, and almost inaudible then, finding in the public service only the occasion for brutal indulgence or vulgar ostentation, the State that sends him is responsible for the degradation. He represents the choice and preference of the majority of its citizens or he would not be there. His credentials are a waiver of complaint, reproof or reproach of his defects.

The Decision of the Ballot-Box

Aside from the sentimental considerations of pride and patriotism, nothing more nearly concerns the selfish personal welfare of every American citizen than good government. Wages, prices, taxes, income, profits, education, commerce, manufactures, farming, money, comfort, prosperity, security of life, property and liberty, all are political questions and are decided at last at the ballot-box. They err who sneeringly say it is only a fight for office and that it makes no difference which succeeds. Some of the recent revolutions in our politics have depreciated the value of every acre of land in the Republic, impaired the capacity of every debtor to borrow or to pay, and inflicted irreparable injury on the credit of rich and solvent States from which they cannot recover in a generation. In all communities there are more intelligent, industrious, upright, patriotic men and women than knaves, rogues and charlatans. If there were not society would decompose. It would perish from its diseases.

When the honest, thrifty majorities, upon whatever pretext, omit their political duties, neglect the primaries, the nominating conventions and the polls, they abdicate their sovereignty. They wear the crown and wield the sceptre if they will, and if they choose to lay them down it is puerile to whine about bad government. Our political system is not automatic, nor like a clock, that when wound will go till it runs down. It must be kept in motion by personal effort every day, and if good men will not exert its functions then bad men must.

The feeble lamentations in New York, Philadelphia and other popular cities about misrule, plunder and the machine disparage the capacity of their inhabitants for self-government. If such conditions are inevitable then a cleanly, strong, capable, honest despotism would be better than democracy. If the people do not value freedom highly enough to exert its prerogatives and discharge its duties they deserve to be, and sooner or later they will, through their own indifference, become, serfs, vassals and slaves.

The Burdens of the Presidency

The Presidency is the supreme goal of political ambition, but to one acquainted with the conditions of public life it is difficult to conceive why any man should desire to be President of the United States. Admiral Dewey says it is an easy job whose simple functions any one can discharge.

Time, strength and patience are wasted in the ceaseless multiplicity of petty and frivolous details. The study of historic questions, the formulation of national policies are perpetually interrupted by the distractions of paltry personal ambitions, solicitations for office, curiosity, the demands of society and the struggle for continuance in power. This is true the world over.

Few Presidents have gained in public estimation by their incumbency. Many have lost. Grant would have occupied a higher pedestal had he remained at the head of the army, and Lincoln and Garfield both died at a fortunate time for their fame. But, wearing and grinding as are the stress and strain, few, if any, have been broken by the tension. The White House has been exceptionally free from tragedies. Taylor died from a surfeit of cherries and milk, and Harrison from a cold contracted by riding bareheaded in a snowstorm up the avenue from the Capitol the day of his inauguration. Possibly Polk was the only President who succumbed to the wearisome burdens of his office. He died June 15, 1849, three months after the close of his term, at the comparatively early age of fifty-four.

The ideal place for one with aptitude for public life is the Senate. The House offers wider scope for leadership, broader field for power and fame. In the Senate there are no leaders, and rivalry and emulation never degenerate into vulgar strife for mere supremacy.

Representing States, rather than constituencies, its members are equals in dignity and station, and applause is conceded to excellence without respect to partisanship. Courtesy is the rule of its conduct and the characteristic of its debates. Its records have seldom been defaced by personal invective or discreditable altercation. Length of term exempts its action from the casual aberrations of popular error and the passions of the populace. The limitation of numbers affords opportunity for deliberate discussion of fundamental principles of government and administration, and a more leisurely consideration of public matters.

Its judgment of recruits is affable but pitiless. Every newcomer has a hearing, and scrutiny is relentless. He is gauged, weighed, estimated and assigned to his own place. From this verdict there is no review nor any exculpation nor appeal. For shallow shams, empty pretenders, smart Alecks and pompous dullness the Senate is a most uncomfortable tribunal.

Censure of the Senate is always popular. When icicles hang by the wall and days are dark and ways are foul, the fresh correspondent from the West finds an inexhaustible fund of entertaining and venerable plate material in denunciation of the American House of Lords, the Millionaires' Club, the Bankers' Syndicate, its methods, its expenditures, its bath-rooms, barber-shop, bay rum, stationery accounts and apollinaris lemonade. The demand for its immediate and unconditional abolition and the election of its members by the people is greeted with prodigious enthusiasm by every Wat Tyler, Perkin Warbeck, Guy Fawkes and Jack Cade in the land.

Randall . . . . . twice Speaker, acknowledged leader of the House

But as rocks resist the billows and the sky, the Senate stands an impregnable bulwark of constitutional liberty, the strong citadel and tower of defense for the constantly menaced institutions of self-government, a barrier alike against the frenzied onset of faction and the insidious encroachment of privilege and prerogative.

Born with the nation, it has advanced with equal footstep in dignity and power, and when the gavel falls to announce the close of its last session, the Government itself will stand adjourned without day.

IT WAS high noon of a warm summer's day when Moo Kow came down to the Watering Place. Miaow, otherwise known as "Puskat"—the warmth-loving one—was crouching on a limb that overhung the pool, sunning herself. Brer Rabbit—but that is Another Story by Another Person.

Three or four Gee Gees, already at the pool, moved away on the approach of Moo Kow.

"Why do ye stand aside?" said the Moo Kow.

"Why do you say 'ye'?" said the Gee Gees together.

"Because it's more impressive than 'you.' Don't you know that all animals talk that way in English?" said the Moo Kow.

"And they also say 'thou'—and don't you forget it!" interrupted Miaow from the tree. "I learnt that from a Man Cub."

The animals were silent. They did not like Miaow's slang, and were jealous of her occasionally sitting on a Man Cub's lap. Once, Dun-kee, a poor relation of the Gee Gees, had tried it on, disastrously—but that is also Another and a more Aged Story.

"We are ridden by The English—please to observe the Capital letters," said Pi Ból, the Leader of the Gee Gees, proudly. "They are a mighty race who ride anything and everybody. D'ye mind that—I mean, Look ye well to it!"

"What should they know of England who only England know?" said Miaow.

"Is that a conundrum?" asked the Moo Kow.

"No; it's poetry," said the Miaow.

"I know England," said Pi Ból prancingly. "I used to go from the Bank to Islington three times a day—I mean," he added hurriedly, "before I became a screw—I should say, a screw-gun horse."

"And I," said the Moo Kow, "am terrible. When the young women and children in the village see me approach they fly shriekingly. My presence alone has scattered their sacred Festival—The Sundés Kool Piknik. I strike terror to their inmost souls, and am more feared by them than even Kreep-mows, the insidious! And yet, behold! I have taken the place of the Mothers of men, and I have nourished the mighty ones of the Earth! But that," said the Moo Kow, turning her head aside bashfully, "that is Anudder Story."

A dead silence fell on the pool.

"And I," said Miaow, lifting up her voice, "I am the Horror and Haunter of the Night Season. When I pass like the Night Wind over the roofs of the houses men shudder in their beds and tremble. When they hear my voice as I creep stealthily along their balconies they cry to their gods for succor. They arise, and from their windows they offer me their priceless household treasures—the sacred vessels dedicated to their great god Shiv—which they call "Shivin Mugs"—the Kloes Brösh, the Boo-jak—urging me to fly them! And yet," said Miaow mournfully, "it is but my Love Song! Think ye what they would do if I were on the War-Path."

Another dead silence fell on the pool. Then arose that strange, mysterious, indefinable Thing, known as "The Scent." The animals sniffed.

"It heralds the approach of the Stalkies—the most famous of British Skool Boaz," said the Moo Kow. "They have just placed a decaying guinea-pig, two white mice in an advanced state of decomposition, and a single slice of Limburger cheese in the bed of their tutor. They had previously skillfully diverted the drains so that they emptied into the drawing-room of the Head Master. They have just burned down his house in an access of noble zeal, and are fighting among themselves for the spoil. Hark! do ye hear them?"

A wild medley of shrieks and howls had arisen, and an irregular mob of strange creatures swept out of the distance toward the pool. Some were like pygmies, some had bloody noses. Their talk consisted of feverish, breathless ejaculations—a gibberish in which the words "rot," "Oach" and "giddy" were preëminent. Some were exciting themselves by chewing a kind of "bhang" made from the plant called Pappahmint—others had their faces streaked with Djam.

"But who is this they are ducking in the pool?" asked Pi Ból.

"It is one who has foolishly and wantonly conceived that his parents have sent him here to study," said the Moo Kow, "but that is against the rules of the Stalkies, who accept study only as a punishment."

"Then these be surely the 'Bander Log'—the Monkey Folk—of whom the good Rhuddyidd has told us," said a Gee Gee—"the ones who have no purpose—and forget everything."

"Fool!" said the Moo Kow. "Know ye not that the great Rhuddyidd has said that these Stalkies become Major-Generals, V. C.'s and C. B.'s of The English? Truly, they are great. Look now, ye shall see one of the greatest traits of the English Stalky."

One of the pygmy Stalkies was offering a Bunn to a larger one, who hesitated, but took it coldly.

"Behold! it is one of the greatest traits of this Mighty Race not to show any emotion. He would take the Bunn—he has taken it!—he is pleased—but he may not show it. Observe him eat."

The taller Stalkie, after eating the Bunn, quietly kicked the giver, knocked off his hat, and turned away with a calm, immovable face.

"Good!" said the Moo Kow. "Ye would not dream that he was absolutely choking with grateful emotion?"

"We would not," said the animals.

"But why are they now all running back the way they came?" asked Pi Ból.

"They are going back to Punishment. Great is its power. Have ye not heard the Gospel of Rhuddyidd the Mighty? 'Force is everything! Gentleness won't Wash, Courtesy is deceitful. Politeness is Foreign. Be ye Beaten that ye may Beat. Pass the Kick on.'"

But here he was interrupted by the appearance of Three Soldiers who were approaching the Watering Place.

"Ye are now," said the Moo Kow, "with the Main Guard. The first is Bleareyed, who carries a Raven in a cage, which he has stolen from the wife of a Deputy Commissioner. He will paint the Bird snow white and sell it as a Dove to the same lady. The second is Otherwise, who is dragging a small garden Engine of which he has despoiled a native gardener, whom he has felled with a single blow. The third is Mulledwiney, swinging a cut-glass decanter of sherry which he has just snatched from the table of his Colonel. Mulledwiney and Otherwise will play the Engine upon Bleareyed, who is suffering from Heat Apoplexy and Djim Djams."

The Three Soldiers seated themselves in the pool.

"They are going to tell awful War Stories now," said the Moo Kow, "Stories that are Large and Strong! Some people are shocked—others like 'em."

Then, he that was called Mulledwiney told a Story. In the middle of it Miaow got up from the limb of the tree, coughed slightly and put her paw delicately over her mouth. "You must excuse me," she said faintly. "I am taken this way sometimes—and I have left my salts at home. Thanks! I can get down myself!" The next moment she had disappeared, but was heard coughing in the distance.

Mulledwiney winked at his companions and continued his story:

"Wid that we wor in the thick av the foight. Whin I say 'thick' I mane it, Sorr! We wor that jammed together, divil a bit cud we shoot or cut! At furrest, I had lashed two mushkits together wid the baynits out so—like a hay fork—and, getting the Haymaker's Lift on thim, I just lifted two Paythians out—one an aych baynit—and passed 'em, aisy-like, over me head to the rear rank for them to finish. But what wid the blud gettin' into me oi's, I was blinded, and the pressure kept incraysin' until me arrums was thrussed like a fowl to me sides, and sorra a bit cud I move but me jaws!"

"And bloomin' well you knew how to use them," said Otherwise.

"Thrue for you—though ye don't mane it!" said Mulledwiney, playfully tapping Otherwise on the head with the decanter till the cut glass slowly shivered. "So, begorra! there wor nothing left for me to do but to ate thim! Wirra! but it was the crooel worruk."

"Excuse me, my Lord," interrupted the gasping voice of Pi Ból as he began to back from the pool, "I am but a horse, I know, and being Built in that Way—naturally have the stomach of one—yet, really, my Lord, this—er——" And his voice was gone.

The next moment he had disappeared. Mulledwiney looked around with affected concern.

"Save us! But we've cleaned out the Jungle! Sure, there's not a Baste left but ourselves!"

It was true. The Watering Place was empty. Moo Kow, Miaow and the Gee Gees had disappeared. Presently there was a booming crash and a long, deep rumbling among the distant hills. Then they knew they were near the old Moulmein Pagoda and the Dawn had come up like Thunder out of China 'cross the Bay. It always came up that way there. The strain was too great, and Day was actually breaking.

Franklin and the Declaration of Independence

By John Gilmer Speed

WHEN the Declaration of Independence was prepared in 1776, Benjamin Franklin was seventy years old. He was one of the most talked-about personages in the world and by long odds the most learned and the most popular man in America.

Moreover, he had already acquired and won general recognition for marvelous skill in writing, a skill so great that after more than a century he is still regarded by critics as "the most uniformly readable writer of English who has yet appeared on this side of the Atlantic."

Indeed, he was the only man in America who then had a European reputation, the only man who had intimate personal knowledge of the men and the forces in England with which the Colonists were then at war. He was truly a distinguished man with tested abilities that justified his great distinction.

On June 11, 1776, the Continental Congress appointed Jefferson, Adams, Franklin, Sherman and Livingston to draw up the Declaration of Independence, which was moved by Richard Henry Lee, of Virginia, and seconded by John Adams, of Massachusetts, on July 2, and adopted on July 4—the Declaration which said that

> "These United Colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States, that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British Crown, and that all political connection between them and the State of Great Britain is, and ought to be, totally dissolved."

It has always been a curious puzzle why Franklin, the man of ripe age, of commanding distinction and of approved literary skill, was not selected to write this Declaration instead of Thomas Jefferson, then only thirty-three years old and comparatively unknown. It could not be that Franklin was passed by because he had done everything within his power to avert the war and reconcile the differences between the Colonies and the Mother Country, for all wise men in the Colonies did all that honor permitted in that direction until the die was cast. No, it was not a fear of Franklin's earnestness in the cause of the Colonies—it was probably the fear of Franklin's humor.

He was not only the greatest man of his time but he was one of the greatest humorists of any time. And so his associates were possibly afraid that he would put a joke in the Declaration, and passed him by and selected the lank young Virginian with the freckled face.

As it was, Franklin did have his joke, for when the members of Congress were about to sign the declaration, Hancock, whose earnestness is expressed in the bold signature which comes first, said in his own earnest way: "We must be unanimous; there must be no pulling different ways; we must all hang together."

"Yes," replied Franklin, "we must hang together or we shall be pretty sure to hang separately."

Young Barbarians

The Tournament

By Ian Maclaren

SINCE the day when the Sparrow and a few young friends had broken every pane of glass in the Count's windows, and the Count had paid for the damage like a gentleman, that excellent foreigner had spent all his spare cash—which we thought afterward was not very much—in encouraging athletic exercises among the Seminary lads. His zeal, like that of every other convert, was much greater than his knowledge, and left to his own devices he would certainly have gone far astray; but with the able assistance of the Sparrow, with whom he took intimate counsel, it was astonishing what a variety could be infused into the sports. When every ordinary competition had been held, and champions had been declared (and this had never been done before in the history of the school) for the hundred yards, the quarter and the mile (the ten miles down the Carse and over the top of Kinnoul Hill had been stopped by an impromptu meeting of parents), for broad jumping and high jumping, for throwing the cricket-ball and kicking the football, the Sparrow came out with a quite new program which was rapturously received, and, had it not met with a cross-providence, would have lasted over four happy Saturdays and considerably reduced the attendance at the Seminary.

The first item was a swimming match across the Tay, a river not to be trifled with, and four boys were saved from death by a salmon cobble, whose owner fortunately turned up to watch the sport. The Count was so excited by this event that he not only lost his hat in the river, but, being prevented from going in to help, for the very good reason that he could not swim a stroke, he took off and flung the coat, which was the marvel of Muirtown, into the river, in the hope that it might serve as a life-belt.

The second item, upon which the Sparrow prided himself very much, was a climbing match, and for this he had selected a tree which seemed to be designed for the purpose, since it had a rook's nest on its highest branch, and no branches at all for the first twenty feet. The conditions were, that every boy above twelve should have his chance, and the boy who climbed to the top, put his hand into the rook's nest, and came down in the shortest time should get the prize. The Seminary above twelve were going up and down that tree a whole Saturday morning, and in one kirk next day thanks were offered in the first prayer in peculiarly dignified and guarded terms that half the families of Muirtown had not been bereaved. As a matter of fact, nobody was killed, and no limbs were broken, but the Sparrow, who was not allowed to enter for this competition, but acted as judge, with his tongue out all the time at the sight of the sport, had to go up twice on errands of mercy, once to release his friend Howieson, who had missed a branch and was hanging by his feet, and the second time to succor Pat Ritchie, who was suspended by the seat of his trousers, swaying to and fro like a gigantic apple on the branch.

It was understood that the Seminary had never enjoyed themselves so entirely to their heart's content, but the Count's moral courage failed during the performance, and at the most critical moment he was afraid to look.

When Muirtown got wind of this last achievement of the Sparrow's, indignation meetings were held at church doors and street corners, and it was conveyed to the Rector—who knew nothing about the matter, and was so absent-minded that if he had passed he would never have seen what was going on—that if Providence was going to be tempted in this fashion again the matter would be brought before the town council. The Count himself would have been faithfully dealt with had he not been considered a helpless tool in the hands of the Sparrow, who was now understood to have filled the cup of his sins up to the brim, and he might have been at last expelled from the Seminary, of which he was the chief ornament, had it not been that the Count went to the Rector and explained that the idea had been his from beginning to end, and that it was with the utmost difficulty he could induce the Sparrow even to be present. For, as I said, the Count was a perfect gentleman and always stood by his friends through thick and thin; but the thrashing which the Sparrow got from Bulldog was monumental, and in preparation for it that ingenious youth put on three folds of underclothing.

What the Sparrow bitterly regretted, however, was not the punishment, which was cheap at the money, but the loss of the next two items in his program. He had planned a boxing competition, in which the main feature was to be a regular set-to between Dunc Robertson and himself, to decide finally which was the better man, for they had fought six times and the issue was still doubtful, and the Sparrow, who had a profligate genius outside the class-rooms, had also imagined a pony race with hurdles; and as about twenty fellows, farmers' sons and others, had ponies of which they were always bragging, and the Sparrow had the pick of his father's stables, he modestly believed that the affair would be worth seeing. When the hurdle race was forbidden, for which the Sparrow had already begun to make entries and to arrange weights with his father's valuable assistance, he took the matter so much to heart that his health gave way, and Mr. McGuffie, senior, had to take him to recruit at the Kilmarnock Races, from which he returned in the highest spirits and full of stories.

For some time after this painful incident the Count lay low and adopted a deprecating manner when he met the fathers and mothers of Muirtown; but he gave his friends to understand that his resources were not at an end, and that he had a surprise in store for the Seminary. The Sparrow ran over every form of sport in casual conversation to discover what was in the Count's mind, but he would not be drawn and grew more mysterious every day.

One Saturday evening in midsummer he took the Sparrow and Nestie into his confidence, explaining that his idea would be announced to the assembled school by himself next Wednesday, and that it had nothing to do, as the Sparrow had hinted in turn, with rats, or rabbits, or fencing, or the sword dance. With their permission he would say one word which would be enough for persons of so distinguished an imagination, and that word was "Tournament"; and he would speak of nothing else except the beauty of the evening light upon the river, which he declared to be "ravaging," and the excellence of a certain kind of chocolate which he carried in his pocket and shared generously with his "dogs." As he parted with his friends the Count tapped his nose and winked at them—"Tournament—great, magnificent, you will see, ha, ha! you will see"; and the Sparrow went home in a state of utter confusion, coming finally to the conclusion that the Count intended to introduce some French game, and in that case it would be his painful duty to oppose the Count tooth and nail, for everybody knew that French games were only for girls, and would bring endless disgrace upon Muirtown Seminary.

During Sunday Nestie had turned the matter over in his mind, and being full of Scott's novels he was able on Monday to afford the astonished school a full program with the most minute particulars. The tournament was to be held in the North Meadow, the judge was to be the commander of the cavalry at the barracks, John McGlashan, the town's bellman was to be herald, the Fair Maid of Perth was to be the Queen of Beauty, and the combatants were to be such mighties as Robertson, Howieson, and, of course, the Sparrow. Each knight was to be in armor, and Nestie freely suggested dish-covers would be useful as breast-plates, broom-handles would come in conveniently for lances, and, as ponies were now forbidden, sturdy boys of the lower forms would be used instead. The two knights who challenged one another would rush from opposite ends of the lists, meet in the centre, lance upon breast-plate, horse to horse, and man to man, and the one that overthrew the other would receive the prize; and at the thought of such a meeting between the Sparrow and Dunc Robertson, each in full armor, the delighted school smacked their lips.

"Muirtown Races 'ill be nothing to it," said Ritchie. "I'll lay anybody a shilling that Spiug coups Dunc the first meeting; but"—feeling as if it were almost too good to be true—"I dinna believe a word o't. Nestie is a fearsome liar." And after the school had spoken of nothing else for a day, Dunc Robertson asked the Count whether such things were true.

"Mon ami," said the Count, who had tasted Nestie's romance with much relish, "you will pardon me, but it is a banalité, that is what you call a stupidity, to ask whether so good a jeu d'esprit is true. True? Truth is a dull quality, it belongs to facts; but Nestie, he does not live among facts, he flies in the air, in the atmosphere of poetry. He is a raconteur. A tournament with knights on the North Meadow—good! Our little Nestie, he has been reading 'Ivanhoe' and he is a troubadour." And the Count took off his hat in homage to Nestie's remarkable powers as an author of fiction.

"But yes, it will be a tournament; but not for the body, for the mind. My dogs are jolly dogs; they can run, they can leap, they can swim, they can kick the ball; now they must think, ah! so deep. They must write their very best words, they must show that they have beautiful minds; and they will do so, I swear they will, in the tournament which will not be on the meadow—no; too many cows there, and too many washers of clothes—but in seclusion, in the class-room of that brave man called the Bulldog. It will be a battle," concluded the Count with enthusiasm, "of heads; and the best head, that head will have the prize, voilà."

"Silence!" and Bulldog brought his cane down upon his desk that Wednesday afternoon when the whole upper school was gathered in his class-room, bursting with curiosity. "The Count has a proposition to lay before you which he will explain in his own words and which has the sanction of the Rector. You will be pleased to give the Count a respectful hearing, as he deserves at your hands." And Bulldog was there to see that the Count's deserts and his treatment strictly corresponded.

"Monsieur," and the Count bowed to Bulldog, "and you," and now he bowed to the boys, "all my friends of the Seminary, I have the honor to ask a favor which your politeness will not allow you to refuse. Next Saturday I will dare to hold a reception in this place, with the permission of the good Bull—— I do forget myself—I mean the distinguished master. And when you come I promise you that I will not offer you coffee—pouf! it is not for the brave boys I see before me, now," and the Count became very roguish. "I will put a leetle, very leetle sentence on the——" ("Blackboard," suggested Bulldog) "Merci, yes, the blackboard; no, the honorable master he will have the goodness to write it in his so beautiful characters. One sentence, that is all, and you will sit for one hour in this room where you make your studies, and you will write all the beautiful things which come into your heads about that sentence. You will then do me the pleasure of letting me carry home all those beautiful things, and I will read them; and the writer who affects me most, I will ask him to accept a book of many volumes, and the Lor' Mayor" ("Provost," interpolated Bulldog) "will present it on the great day in the Town Hall.

"No one, not even the honorable master himself, will know that leetle sentence till it be written on the—the——" ("Blackboard," said Bulldog, with asperity), "and every boy will be able to write many things about that sentence. The scholars upon whom I do felicitate the honorable master will write much learning," and the Count made a graceful inclination in the direction of the two Dowbiggins, "and the brave boys who love the sport, they will also write, ah! ah!"—and the Count nodded cheerfully in the direction of the Sparrow—"such wonderful things. There will be no books; no, you will have your heads, and so it will be the fair play, as you say," repeated the Count with much satisfaction—"the fair play."

Bulldog dismissed the school after he had explained that no one need come unless he wished, but that any one who didn't come was missing the opportunity of securing an honorable distinction, and would also show himself to be an ungrateful little scoundrel for all that the Count had done for the Seminary.

— shouted at the pitch of his voice through the stillness of the hall, "Nestie Maclaren"

"Dod," said Jock Howieson with much native shrewdness, "aifter all his palaver it's naething but anaither confounded exercise," for that worthy had suffered much through impositions, and had never been able to connect one sentence with another in an intelligent manner. "The Dowbiggins can go if they want, and they're welcome to the books. I'm going next Saturday to Woody Island—will you come, Spiug?" And it hung in the balance whether or not the Count would be openly affronted next Saturday when he found himself in the company of half a dozen "swats," while his "jolly dogs" were off in a pack to their island of romance.

The Sparrow could not imagine himself sitting in a class-room on Saturday afternoon except under brute force, and yet he felt it would be ungrateful after all his kindness to leave the Count in the company of such cheerless objects as the Dowbiggins. The remembrance of all the sporting prizes he had won at the Count's hands, and the sight of the Count cheering at the sports, came over his ingenuous heart and moved him to the most unselfish act of his life. "Jock Howieson," said the Sparrow, with considerable dignity, "ye may go to Woody Island if ye like, but it 'ill be the dirtiest trick ye ever played, and I'll black both yir een for ye on Monday. Have we ever had a match, cricket or football, the last four years, and the Count hesna been there? Who got up the sports and gave the prizes? Tell me that, Jock. Who stands ginger-beer at Lucky McCrum's, answer me that, Jock, ye meeserable wretch?" and then clinching every argument on "who paid for the broken glass? I'm doon richt ashamed o' ye, Jock Howieson."

"Will ye go yourself, Spiug?" demanded Jock, rising under this torrent of reproach. "I think I see ye writin' an essay on the hestory o' the Romans, or sic like trash. Ye 'ill hunt us into Bulldog's class-room, and then off yirsel to hunt rabbits; but ye 'ill no play ony tricks on me, Peter McGuffie."

"I will go," said the Sparrow manfully, "though I'll no promise to write."

"Say as sure's death," said Jock, knowing the Sparrow's wiles.

"Sure as death," said the Sparrow, and then the school knew, not only that he would go though he had to sit six hours instead of one, but also that every self-respecting boy in the Seminary must also put in an appearance at the Count's reception.

"Best thing you ever did, Spiug," said Nestie on the way home, "since you pulled me out of the Tay, and I should say that you have a good chance of the prize. What the Count wants is originality, and I never heard a chap with so much original talk as you've got, Spiug. Just you put some of it down, like what you give to the Pennies, and you'll come out first, and it'll be the first prize you ever won."

"If there was a prize for impudence, and the entries were open to all Scotland," said Spiug, "ye would pass the post first and trotting."

"How I Spent My Saturday"

was what the school saw on the board when the Count removed the white cloth, and then he gave a brief exposition of his desires.

"Have the goodness, if you please, to write, not what you ought, but what you want. Were you at the cricket match, you will tell me of the capture of the wickets; or you were in the country, I will hear of the woods and the beautiful pheasants" (this delicate allusion to Mr. Byles' poaching experiences was much appreciated); "or you were among the books, then you will describe what you love in them; or you were looking at a horse, I expect to hear about that horse;" and the whole school understood that this was a direct invitation to the Sparrow to give an exact picture of an Irish mare that his father had just bought. "The subject, ah!" said the Count, "that does not matter; it is the manner, the style, the esprit, that is what I shall value. I wish you all the good success, and I will go a walk in the meadow till you have finished."

"Do your best, laddies," said Bulldog, "for the credit of the school and to please the Count. If I see ony laddie playing tricks I'll do my part to teach him sobriety, and if I see one copying from another, out he goes. Ye have one hour from this meenut—make the most o't," and the tournament was open.

Bulldog, apparently reading his morning paper, and only giving a casual glance to see that no one took advantage of the strange circumstances, was really watching his flock very closely and checking his judgment of each one by this new test. Dull, conscientious lads like the Dowbiggins began at once, in order that they might not lose a moment of time, but might put as much written stuff upon the paper as possible, yet now and again they stopped and looked around helplessly because they had no books and no tutor to assist them, and they realized for the first time how little they had in their own heads.

"Ha! ha!" said Bulldog to himself, "I kent ye were naithing but a painted show, and it 'ill do ye good to find that out for yirselves."

Jock Howieson and his kind regarded the whole matter as a new form of entertainment, and as he could not have put into anything approaching connected words the experiences of his last Saturday, he employed the time in cutting up his unwritten paper into squares of an inch, and making them into pellets with which he prevented the Dowbiggin mind from being too much absorbed in study, until Bulldog went down to call upon him with a cane and plain, simple words.

"His head is an inch thick," said Bulldog, as he went back to his desk, "but there's the making of a man in Jock, though he 'ill never be able to write a decent letter to save his life. He would suit the Scots Greys down to the ground."

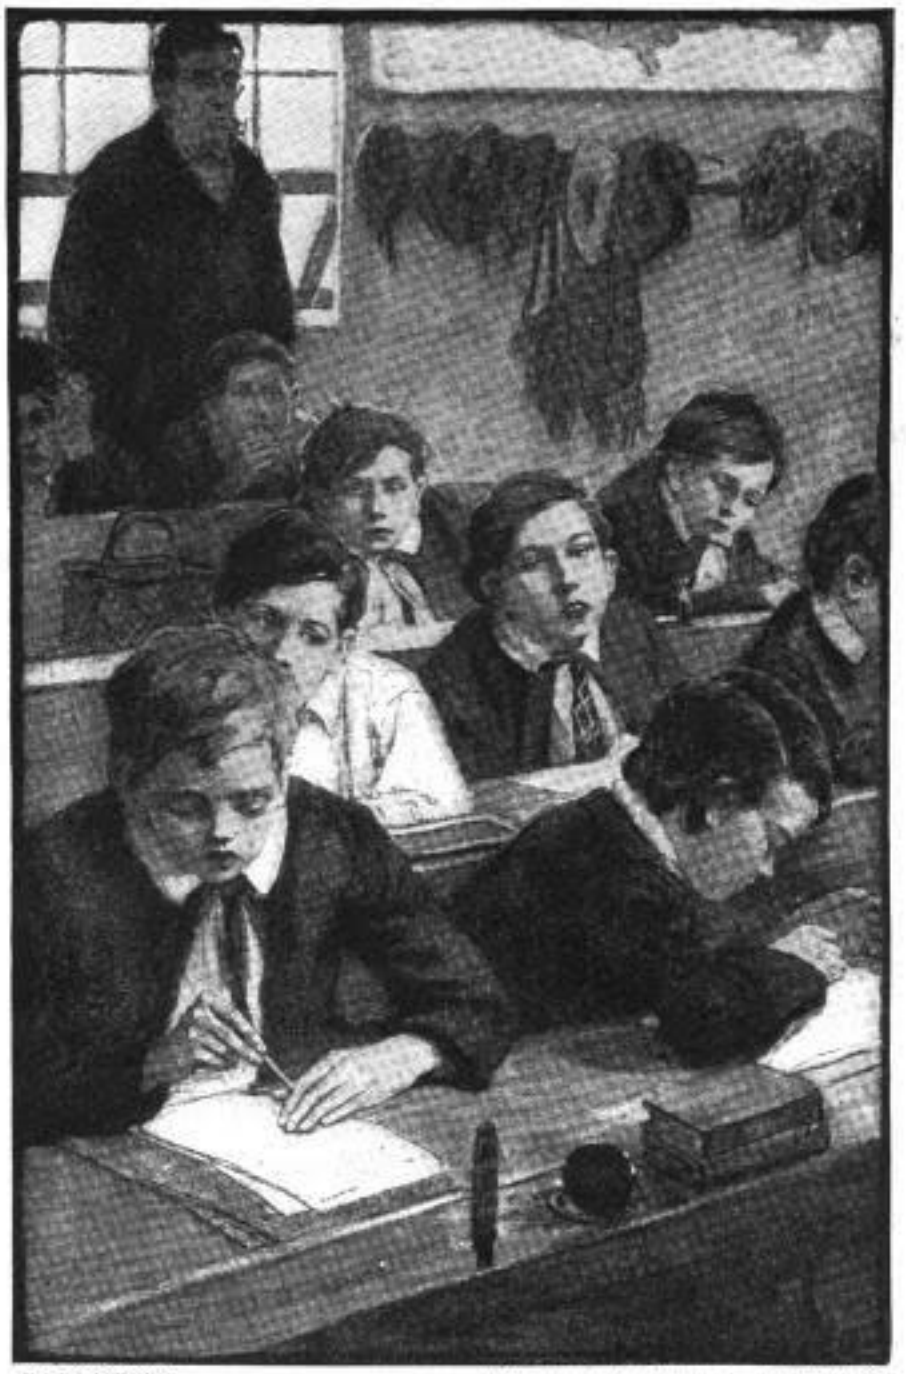
The Sparrow had given a solemn promise to Nestie, under the customary form of oath, that he would write something, and whatever he wrote he would hand in, though it was only twenty words, and Spiug never went back from his oath. When Howieson caught the Dowbiggin ear with a pellet there is no doubt that a joyful light came into the Sparrow's eyes, and he struggled with strong temptation, and when old friends made facetious signs to him he hesitated more than once, but in the end assumed an air of dignified amazement, explaining, as it were, that his whole mind was devoted to literary composition, and that he did not know what they meant by this impertinent intrusion upon a student's privacy.

Cosh certainly jumped once in his seat as if he had been stung by a wasp, and it is certainly true that at that moment there was a piece of elastic on the thumb and first finger of the Sparrow's left hand, but his right hand was devoted to literature. The language which Cosh allowed himself to use in the heat of the moment was so unvarnished that it came under Bulldog's attention, who told him that if he wanted to say anything like that again he must say it in Latin, and that he ought to take notice of the excellent conduct of Peter McGuffie, who, Bulldog declared, was not at all unlikely to win the prize. And as the master returned to his seat his back was seen to shake, and the wink with which the Sparrow favored the class in a brief rest from labor was a reward for an hour's drudgery. Bulldog knew everybody up and down, out and in—what a poor creature Cosh was, and what good stuff could be found in the Sparrow; and he also knew everything that was done—why Cosh had said what he said, and why the Sparrow at that moment was lost in study.

Bulldog was not disappointed when Nestie's face lighted up at the title of the essay, and he knew why his favorite little lad did not write anything for fifteen minutes, but looked steadily out at the window and across the North Meadow, and he returned to his paper with a sense of keen satisfaction when Nestie at last settled down to work and wrote without ceasing, except when now and again he hesitated as for a word or tried a sentence upon his ear to know how it sounded. For the desire of Bulldog's heart was that Nestie should win, and if—though that, of course, was too absurd—the Sparrow by the help of the favoring gods should come in second, Bulldog would feel that he had not lived in vain.

"Ye have three meenuts to dot your i's and stroke your t's," said Bulldog, "and the Count will tell ye how ye're to sign your names," and then the Count, who had come in from his walk, much refreshed, advanced again to the desk.

"It would be one great joy to have your autographs," said the Count, "and I would place them in a book and say, 'My friends,' but honor forbids. As I shall have the too great responsibility of judging, it is necessary that I be—ah! I have forgotten the word—yes! show the fair play. No, I must not know the names; for if I read the name of my friend the ever active, the ever brave, the ever interesting Sparrow" (at this indecent allusion the Sparrow grew purple and gave the bench in front of him to understand by well-known signs that if they looked at him again he might give them something to look for outside), "I would say the Sparrow is a sportsman, he is not a littérateur, and I might not do my comrade the full justice. And if I read the name of the composed, the studious, the profound young gentleman who is before me" (and it was fortunate the Dowbiggins had their backs to the school), "I would know that it must be the best before I read it, and that would not be the fair play.



"No! you will write on your admirable essay a motto—what you please—and your name you will put in an envelope, so," and the Count wrote his own name in the most dashing manner and in an awful silence on a piece of paper, and closed the envelope with a graceful flourish; "and outside you will put your motto, so it will be all the fair play, and in the Town Hall next Saturday I shall have the felicity to declare the result. Voilà! Has my plan your distinguished approbation?" and the Count made a respectful appeal to Bulldog. "Nothing could be fairer, you say. Then it is agreed, and I allow myself to wish you adieu for this day."

When the school assembled for conference among the Russian guns their minds were divided between two subjects—the first was what Spiug had written, on which that strenuous student would give no information, resenting the inquiry both as an insult to his abilities and an illustration of vain curiosity on the part of the school. Nestie, however, volunteered the trustworthy information that Spiug had spent his whole time explaining the good which he had got from being kept in one Saturday forenoon, and doing mathematical problems under the eye of Bulldog. And Nestie added that he thought it mean of Peter to "suck up" to the master in this disgraceful fashion just for the sake of getting a prize. Peter confided to Nestie afterward that he had really done his best to describe a close race for the Kilmarnock Cup, but that he didn't think there were six words properly spelt from beginning to end, and that if he escaped without a thrashing he would treat Nestie to half a dozen bottles of ginger-beer.

Regarding the winner—for that was the other subject—there was a unanimous and sad judgment: that Dunc Robertson might have a chance, but that Thomas John, the head of the Dowbiggins, would carry off the prize, as he had carried off all the other prizes; and that, if so, they would let him know how they all loved him at the Town Hall, and that it would be wise for him to go home with the Count's prize and all the other prizes in a cab with the windows up.

The prize-giving in the Town Hall was one of the great events in the Muirtown year, and to it the memory of a Seminary lad goes back with keen interest. All forenoon the Provost and the bailies had been sitting in the class-room of the Seminary, holding Latin books in their hands, which they opened anywhere, and wagging their heads in solemn approval over the translation by Thomas John and other chosen worthies, while the parents wandered from place to place and identified their sons, who refused to take any notice of them unless nobody was looking. What mothers endured cannot be put into words when they saw their darling boys (whom they had seen dressed that morning in their Sunday clothes, and sent away in perfect array, with directions that they were not to break their collars, nor soil their jackets, nor disarrange their hair the whole day, or they need not come home in the evening) turn up in a class-room before the respectable of Muirtown as if their heads had not known a brush for six months, with the Sparrow's autograph upon their white collar, a button gone from their waistcoat, and an ounce of flour in a prominent place on their once speckless jacket.

"Yes," said one matron to another with the calmness of despair, "that is my Jimmy, I cannot deny it; but ye may

Literary Folk as they Came and Went With Ourselves

By Elizabeth Stoddard

The Bird of Time has but a little way
To flutter, and the Bird is on the wing.
. . . . . .
Whether the Cup with sweet or bitter run
The wine of Life keeps oozing drop by drop,
The leaves of Life keep falling one by one.

—OMAR.

MEDITATING in the eventide of my days I do not admit that my meditations are only of ashes; there are embers that I would light again among them, but they refuse, and I would suggest that the young as soon as they know how to write should begin a diary, not of previsions, feelings, views and aspirations, but of facts, names, actual circumstances. Dates alone are the yardsticks to measure memory. Even now I am referred to regarding matters in which I bore a part, my behavior recalled, what I said and did, and my memory is a blank. Futile impressions remain as if graven on tablets of brass, and I venture to name one or two which have followed me through life.

Dining from home one day I heard a visitor, a little city boy, ask for the "liver wing," and the next time we had roast chicken I made the request for the "liver wing." I did not get it, but to correct this budding epicure a once famous tract was put in my hand, The Shepherd of Salisbury Plain. The happiness of the shepherd's pious children when they had salt for the roasted potatoes which comprised the whole meal, though they were as thankful without salt as with, gave me a lasting dream of going to Salisbury Plain, and among the furze bushes eating salted potatoes with those blessed children, but not one other thing in the tract did I remember a moment. These were the days when I was frequently told that I was only "knee high to a hop toad," and when at that height a certain leather-bound book haunted me—some work on India—and its illustrations have impressed me for life. Pictures of bald-headed fakirs in the dust of the wayside, their limbs fixed in every form of distortion, of men crushed by the wheels of Juggernaut; but the one which was overpowering was that of devout Hindus with iron hooks thrust through the naked shoulders, swinging gracefully from a high frame by means of ropes. I speculated a long time whether these pious souls did not enjoy the swing as I did mine in the orchard, especially when I was forbidden to swing high.

To swing back into my circle again, the opportunity for me to enter into ties of friendship which were to prove so much to me was about to arrive. The first link was forged when, at my sewing one morning, a young man entered whom I recognized as Bayard Taylor. Tall, slender, with close curling hair around a high brow, keen hazel eyes, a Roman nose which an African desert played havoc with afterward, he was all that became a man as well as a poet—though I noticed, as I often noticed afterward when I fell among the poets, that his mouth was weak, or to speak more agreeably, had a feminine touch. The late Wendell Holmes was a marked example of the same class peculiarity. Mr. Taylor wore his naval jacket, for he had just returned from the Perry Expedition and his long travels when "he met men from many lands." We exchanged grins of pleasure, and I soon felt that I should become an annex to his friendship for Mr. Stoddard.

He told me that Commodore Perry, who was an honest, blunt old salt, had allowed him to resign his position as master's mate on a salary of three hundred a year and rations, as he wanted to resume his literary work and to make money to build a house in Kennett. Little did I dream then that his beautiful place, Cedarcroft, was to be for many years my summer home. His young wife, dying with consumption when he married her, who lived but a few months afterward, had now been dead two years. As I looked at him I could not help thinking of the words he wrote to Mr. Stoddard in 1850, a few days after her death: "It is over; she died on Saturday and was buried on Monday in the cruel storm. And if now a saint in Heaven, she had no foes to pardon and no sins to be forgiven; God help me to be worthy of her guarding care through life and her welcome after death." But the arrow rankled in his heart; he never spoke of her; if any occasion suggested her or their past, a change came over his face, something moved him that imposed silence on all about him, a silence he could or would not break. There had been great opposition to his marriage with Miss Agnew, and though he yielded to it, as she did, it was the cause of great bitterness afterward. But alas for human constancy; in 1857 Mr. Taylor married Miss Hansen, of Saxe-Gotha!

Editor's Note—This is the second of three papers by Mrs. Stoddard. The last article in the series will follow in an early number.

Never perhaps was a man's life so changed by two marriages and by two women so different, and none besides himself could better judge of their results. Mr. Taylor and Miss Agnew were attached from childhood, their families were united by marriage. With them, and those with whom she lived, she had the reputation of having no taint of earth about her. When I met in Kennett some of her early friends they spoke of her with bated breath and with reverence as if she were a saint indeed. She was accounted a scholar and faultless in character, but her letters as published in The Life and Letters of Bayard Taylor are those of a pure-minded girl exalté, but not of large intellect or force. The second marriage of Mr. Taylor was under entirely different circumstances. After an acquaintance of several weeks with Miss Hansen while visiting her uncle at Saxe-Gotha, they were married. Though not a woman of society, she was enough a woman of the world by education, training and capacity to support Mr. Taylor in the requirements of his increasing fame, whether as traveler, writer or diplomat, consequently the marriage proved an eminently suitable one. With his changed relations and habits there came a time when the people of Kennett seriously disapproved of the way of his living, which so exasperated him that he wrote from Cedarcroft what he never would have written if Miss Agnew had lived: "There are no such impertinent, meddlesome old Betties in domestic matters as some old male Quakers." It did not please them that he had wine on his table; the temperance workers assailed him, and the abolitionists were as zealous. But Time worked his wonders; the people of Kennett now cherish his memory.

This, his first visit to me, was the last agreeable incident in the green-shuttered bower in Sands Street. I have merely to repeat the miserable subterfuge of everybody, of "circumstances over which we have no control," for the reason of our moving back to New York and taking rooms in a small house on Third Street by Second Avenue, a forlorn place then sparsely built up. There was no garden at the rear, but the walls of a dingy Catholic church, from which, when the windows were open, we heard the roll of the organ. In a building between Third and Second Streets a colony of negroes lived, and they came out of mornings to buy porgies; negroes love fish as cats do, and I fancy have the same dislike for water. It is only of late that I learned what Lady Macbeth meant when she said to Macbeth, "Letting I dare not wait upon I would, like the poor cat i' the adage!" I never walked down our street, where slaughter-houses were, but I was compelled to hear the bellowing cattle, resisting the presage of their doom. Our rooms were small and not sunny. Our properties that were suitable before were not now. This was the beginning of the behavior of two bookcases, the size of a furniture van, which were a late purchase in Sands Street. I am sure the wily dealers knew what a vexation it would be to move them, and sent experienced hands to set them up, thereby deceiving us into keeping them. At each moving they played as many tricks as Gelett Burgess' furniture does in his remarkably funny sketches. If the clever person who wrote an admirable article for a well-known periodical on The Total Depravity of Inanimate Things could have witnessed the escapades of these demon bookcases she would have been assured of her theories. The cracked and broken glass doors, the knocking off of the spurious ornamentation, the twisting of knobs, the shrinking and swelling of the shelves and drawers! The men who moved were stirred to curses in getting them downstairs and up, in the heavy tops falling off on their heads, to say nothing of splinters of glass cutting their faces; and so it was ever thus in all our movings. When the books were put on the shelves I almost hated them, and did not consider that they were very necessary, after all.

BAYARD TAYLOR

For a time I was not "like the bird that sits and sings," for it was for me to prepare for that "rainy day," concerning which I was supposed to have no thought. The high emprise of our marriage was condoned; those who had been unkind came back to be kind again. They belonged to the life I had cast aside and they were magnanimous enough to look upon my spouse as an anomaly attached to me. They all knew of books, of poetry; some had parsed at school Paradise Lost, and on the centre-table of others Byron or Moore, bound in morocco, might be seen, but for one whose aim in life was to "write verses" while moving in a workaday world like everybody else they had little call. Now they are the shades of another world. My first start on an economic basis was the purchase of silver forks which shed a bright and shining light over our table, and then they were "so convenable, you know." It is astonishing to remember that I was proud to own them, but such trifles make up the sum of human life!

We had not been in the house long when we discovered that we were living with a mysterious family; there was none of the noise or stir of household life below us, the shutters were never opened, the landlord went away in the morning, his wife never went out. Occasionally, going through the hall, I caught a glimpse of her in a dark room, always standing in the attitude of one listening. A tragedy was running its length; how it ended we never knew. How many, women especially, are shut within these curtained and shuttered houses? The other day, looking across the street, I saw that gilded iron bars had been put before the upper windows of the house opposite. Somebody was shut in behind the bars!

And then I was ready to receive company in a house so furnished—I should not be willing to live a day in it now. Taste was at as low an ebb as literature. Nevertheless we were to have some good times there.

Mr. Taylor went on a lecture tour soon after his return from the East; his success astonished him so that he wrote us that he "began to examine himself to see what he was and to find himself to be somebody else than he thought he was." At first he disliked the work. Writing to his friend Boker he said: "I am not insensible that nine-tenths of my literary success springs from Views Afoot, as one who has succeeded with little money, strong legs and economical habits. What is there so humiliating as to be praised for the exhibition of poverty and privation, struggles I would have hidden forever?" He had crowded houses everywhere. Women were carried out fainting, the farmers rode miles over the prairie to see and hear him; he had obsequious attention everywhere. I heard him in Brooklyn the following year and was convinced that his reputation of Views Afoot was the cause of his popularity, for he was not remarkable as a lecturer either in delivery or material. At the close of the lecture the crowd, instead of going out as usual, filed before the desk where he stood to get a near look at him. He looked as he felt, as if he was in the pillory, and his face grew redder every instant. In spite of what he called the "miserable business of lecturing," it never lost him his sense of humor, and we reaped the advantage in letters which were bright and funny. From Niles, in Michigan, he sent us a long poem which is not in his collected verse. I quote a few lines. While thinking of his friends one rainy day before lecture time—

"Comes a rapping, tapping
At my chamber door,
But unlike Poe's raven
Crying Evermore,
'Tis the new Committee
Any one can tell.
'Hope you're very well,
Where'd you go to-morrow?
Where'd you lecture last?'
Then again a rapping.
Next a solemn gentleman
Unctuous of face,
'What's your real opinion
Of the human race?'
Then a grim one coming,
'Sprinkling or immersion,
Which do you prefer?'"

"Then from a crowd of bores come all sorts of questions."

On his way to Canada he attempted an ode to the river St. Lawrence, but catching a terrible cold he got no further than

"O St. Lawrence,
Thou'rt my abhorrence!"

He lost his voice and could not write plainly, and ended his letter with: "Give my kide rebebradces to O'Bried whed you see hib, ad believe me your sidcere Fred." The O'Bried he referred to was Fitz James O'Brien, one of a circle of brilliant young Irishmen from London.

These ex-patriots were very human. Boyle O'Reilly made us the best citizen of that company. He escaped in a legitimate way from his banishment in Van Diemen's land, while Meagher tried to save his honor in breaking his parole by calling out at the magistrate's door: "I throw up my parole," and, jumping on the horse in readiness for him, rode off. I am inclined to think that these afflicted persons owed much to Miss Lynch's hospitality; her heart was tender toward such. O'Brien soon found his way to us, and immediately became a welcome and frequent visitor. He was connected with some newspaper and wrote for the magazines. He had the faculty of seeming to be in sympathy with the gifts of others, and, of course, that made him a delightful companion.

Then began the evenings which in time came to be known. From the small parlor in Third Street they went on for years in whatever place we happened to dwell, with changes and additions the same in charm and originality. They ended when Mr. Taylor published a small volume of them in 1872 which he named The Diversions of the Echo Club, but somehow the ancient fire did not illuminate its pages. At this season of lecturing, whenever Mr. Taylor came near enough to us for a run over he went to his rooms in Washington Square always ready for him, and then came to have an evening with us; O'Brien was sure to be there, too, and sometimes George Boker came from Philadelphia; and then the symposium was complete, especially when Mr. Taylor brought something he said was a Homeric beverage and Mr. Stoddard was enduring misery while learning to smoke a cigar. Then began a tournament of wit, neck-and-neck races for a ten-minute poem, a parody or an ode. It was my privilege to behold them in a corner, but, unlike Jack Horner, there was no plum for me.

One evening, when they were flourishing the pen, I was struck with their different characteristics when absorbed in the same pursuit. Mr. Boker had come from a dinner in full dress; he was the only moneyed one of the party. A remarkably handsome man, his head was like Byron's, and he had the vigor of a prize-fighter. There was a curious harmony of color in complexion, hair and eyes; the latter had a tinge of an umber-colored brook when stained by autumn leaves. Mr. Stoddard was more like the ordinary ideal of the poet, pale with dark hair, tossed carelessly, luminous eyes, and shoulders already slightly bent, not the student bend, but from labor in an iron foundry where his mother had blindly placed him when a boy.

Mr. Taylor was of commanding height, his aquiline features and his brows reminded one of the eagle, his eyes beneath as if prepared to storm any height with "Excelsior."

"Flashed like a falchion from its sheath,"

O'Brien looked more like an Englishman, though one could see that the chip was ready on his shoulder; and yet I have seen his fine eyes fill with tears at something heroic or pathetic, a sensibility very misleading. He dropped into our quiet, homely ways, and munched our crackers and cheese as if he had never eaten anything better.

I might have offered them something besides, for I had learned to make scalloped oysters which was the usual fashionable treat then. Is that dish ever seen now that the atrocious little clams are served, properly named Quahogs? As I watched their hands flying over the paper I thought one learned in palmistry would have said noble blood was in their veins, for their hands were not the hands of laborers. How young they were, how they laughed and jeered each other!

O'Brien went on swimmingly for two or three years; he had been the dramatic editor of the Saturday Press, which "was suspended for the want of funds and recommenced for the same reason." Then he went on the staff of the New York Times. While there, a charity bazar was started by some of his influential friends who had the utmost confidence in him. With his usual energy he took all and any part assigned him. It was a success and the proceeds were sent to the Times office in his charge; he never returned the money, or made any explanation; he simply let his friends alone, but it was the beginning of the downward flight of the son of the morning. Then it came out that he had sold his story, The Diamond Lens, twice—to the Harpers first and then to the Atlantic Monthly. It is only recently that I saw the mention of that story as one of the best of that time. We heard sad things of him—of drunken fights, of his frequenting Pfaff's, where, according to Howells' account of a visit there, the Bohemians "played at orgies."

O'Brien made no attempt to visit us after the reports. Mr. Stoddard saw him coming toward him one day on the street. O'Brien held his hat in his hand and with a deep obeisance tried to speak, but he was passed by silently. When I heard of this I could not help feeling that he was sometimes sincere in the friendship which in no way could be of service to him. His end came mercifully; he enlisted in our Civil War, was wounded in an early skirmish and died in a camp hospital, dying, as perhaps he thought, "game." "Give my love to the boys" were his last words.

The Knickerbocker Magazine still lingered, in spite of the diatribes against its editor by Poe, who wrote that "the principal cause of its decline may be traced to the peculiar and unappreciated talents of its editor, Lewis Gaylord Clark, his best friends not being able to explain how he has made a considerable noise in the literary world." However that was, while we were in Third Street, on a certain evening we found ourselves in a parlor of a certain hotel, perhaps the Clarendon, where Mr. Lewis Gaylord Clark was holding forth in a small company. He was of the florid, rollicking style; at the piano he dashed off songs of the "flowing bowl" sort; if poverty gnawed at his vitals he hid it with a gay "tooral-looral-loo." It was owing to these traits, perhaps, that it was said he got a good deal out of people, especially in contributions for his magazine. Mrs. Elizabeth Kinney, the poetess, speaks in her memoirs of his twin brother, Willis Gaylord Clark, as a remarkably accomplished, intellectually gifted man, who died too young to confirm a reputation. After this evening a circular was sent to the Knickerbocker's contributors with the proposition that "it being known to the friends of the veteran editor, Lewis Gaylord Clark, that his pecuniary recompense was altogether disproportioned to his labors, a testimonial of esteem which should be pleasing as a compliment and a contribution to his happiness should be offered him in the form of a suitable cottage on the banks of the Hudson."

All the contributors fell to work in prose and verse. Steel engravings of the writers were effective when printed. A singular likeness appeared in the portraits in bushy hair, whiskers and weighty neckcloth in folds. Mr. Stoddard was represented as a young giant with a ferocious mustache, Mr. Taylor as an approaching conqueror with a Roman nose, and Mr. Boker as a debonair, gilded youth; but Mr. Hueston, the publisher of the magazine, brought out the book in fine form; Mr. Clark's portrait faced it, and a gilt, ornate cottage was on the cover. I have never seen but our own copy which has slumbered peacefully on its shelf for forty years, but the cottage on the Hudson was never built.

Having plenty of leisure the throes of composition set in upon me again, and, like Mr. Barkis in David Copperfield, getting out of bed toward his money bag, "with infinite pains and with mental groans," I composed several poems which I sent to Mr. Clark, who with kindly words accepted and published them. I then made an engagement with Charles Washburn, one of the celebrated Brothers Washburn and editor of the Alta California newspaper in San Francisco, to write New York letters, which I continued till he left the paper, two years afterward. This engagement proved useful in two ways: teaching me to write prose and the earning of money. Every month I received a check for twenty-four dollars, which possessed many imaginative possibilities which were never realized. At any rate, I was the first female wage-earner that I had known, and it gave me a curious sense of independence. I could take my purse and go forth after the manner of the sailor, whose voyage paid off, took his hat under his arm, full of silver dollars, and invited every one he met to help himself and do the same, provided I wished it.

I think it was in September of that year that Mr. Taylor, who in the interval of lecturing was at work on the Tribune, took a Saturday and Sunday to go with us to visit his family at the farm, a mile or so beyond the old village of Kennett Square. This visit was as great a novelty to me as if I had landed in Liverpool and started for London. Everything was different from the wind-shaken, flat shores where I lived by Buzzard's Bay. We left the train at Wilmington to find a carriage waiting for us, and rode fourteen miles through a pastoral country. The peace of harvest was over the land, and the barns were bursting with plenty; the woods of chestnut up the hillsides, the noble oaks or elms in the meadows still green and lusty, and the cattle with the spot of color like Constable's landscapes were all delightful. Away with the sordid city and dull Third Street; rather let me ruminate with the pleasant cow yonder, leg deep in a lovely brook! In the little runlets which crossed the road here and there between slight ridges the water was so clear and nimble that I wished to alight and paddle in it; in fact I was growing childish and gleeful every minute.

We passed through the centre of Kennett village—which was like an English village with its stone inn and bake shop next it, and a row of brick houses set together with glimpses of alleys with lovely views beyond; we rode up a way between high banks and turned into a rough lane which brought us to the house where the family—father, mother, two sisters and the youngest, a brother—were on the little portico to welcome us.

I was familiar with the picture of Mr. Taylor's home, which was painted by Buchanan Read and engraved as the frontispiece of Views Afoot. The house was old, with plastered walls broken and stained by time; there was no paint outside or inside the premises; the only thing in order was Mrs. Taylor's garden, with its flowers, its neat paths, and the tall, vigorous fir beside a plastered basin or a little fountain. The house had settled into a dell, and there was no view from any side of it. I do not think I saw a stick of modern furniture inside, but I had come across the cleanliness that was next to godliness, and upon a poverty, if I may call it so, where there was a certain plenty—a poverty that was frank and noble. From that day I was proud, and have continued so through long years, of the friendship thus begun.

Mr. and Mrs. Richard Henry Stoddard

Doctor Van Dyke's Browning Story

DR. HENRY VAN DYKE, of Princeton, delivered his lecture on Robert Browning recently in Philadelphia in the Y. M. C. A. Hall. He was introduced by the Rev. Charles Wood, pastor of the Walnut Street Presbyterian Church, who said that he knew a story about Browning which he doubted if even such an authority as Doctor Van Dyke was familiar with. It was the story of a young lady engaged to a British officer. When she found out that he was not acquainted with the poetry of Robert Browning she immediately broke the engagement. Six months later the officer presented himself and asked to be examined on Browning. She found that he had read all of The Ring and the Book, knew the plot of Paracelsus and could recite the greater part of Sordello. Six weeks later Robert Browning himself gave away the bride.

Doctor Van Dyke made no allusion to his ignorance of this story until the close of his introductory remarks. He reviewed the great influence of Browning, attested even by the separation of families. Then he paused and, turning to Doctor Wood, said, "Here follows in my manuscript the story which Doctor Wood has told."

MEN & WOMEN OF THE HOUR

John B. McDonald, Tunnel Digger

John B. McDonald, the contractor for the proposed New York tunnel for the rapid transit railroad, is about fifty-six years old and has made his fortune by hard work. From the moment he received his contract he became the most talked-about man in New York, but during all the controversy over his bonds he gave no statements to the press. Mr. McDonald believes in working, not talking, and when asked the other day what was the most memorable incident in his life he replied that there was none. Evidently the efforts of certain corporations to secure most of his prospective profits before they would guarantee his bonds were only a trivial detail of his business, like his final triumph in securing the aid of August Belmont and unlimited foreign wealth for his undertaking.

Mr. McDonald's offices are probably the highest in the world. He occupies the twenty-sixth and twenty-seventh stories of a down-town building, and on a clear day, with field glasses, he can come near seeing every foot of his work from City Hall to Spuyten Duyvil without leaving his chair.

It is to his workingmen that the contractor is best known. He sees them daily and knows not only their work but their individual capabilities. It is said that he can get more work out of his men without urging them than any other man in New York, unless it is John D. Crimmins, the millionaire railroad builder.

One day last spring at Jerome Park, where Mr. McDonald is doing the greatest work of his life except the tunnel contract, a visitor noticed a square man, covered with mud and built like a peg top with wide-spreading shoulders, talking to the foreman.

"Say!" he asked of a laborer, "is that Mr. McDonald, the famous contractor who is going to build the rapid transit tunnel?"

"Naw," answered the workman. "He ain't no famous contractor. That's Jack McDonald, our boss."

Why Joaquin Miller Took to Farming

Mr. Joaquin Miller, the California poet, has a flourishing fruit farm which is his present fad. It has taken the place of the house in the tree. The new directory of San Francisco registers him as "Joaquin Miller, fruit farmer." When his friends twitted him about it he answered that, according to a girl in Chicago, he supposed he should write poetry, but farming was his passion. Mr. Miller explained, with a twinkle in his eye, that when he was being entertained in Chicago he was attracted by an exceedingly pretty girl about eighteen years old.

"I insisted upon knowing her," said Mr. Miller, "and tried to make her feel that I was as young as the rest of them by taking her out on the moonlit piazza and quoting poetry to her. At the end of my verses she looked up at the old man beside her with a pretty show of interest, and said: 'Dear me, Mr. Miller! you certainly should write poetry. You say such sweet things!'"

Miss Arnold's Reply to an Encore

Miss Sarah Arnold, now a prominent educator of the East, holds the position of supervisor in the primary schools of Boston, but in reality her specialty in the profession may not be defined, for her personal power is so great that she is a class by herself. "She is a master and yet a genius," said a man who has been closely associated with her in her work.

While she was still a girl, just from Bridgewater Normal School and teaching in Middleboro, Massachusetts, the townspeople made great opposition to her, but about that time the chairman of the State Board of Education, after a visit to her school, observed, "Miss Arnold is the best grammar school teacher I ever saw." That distinction by an expert marked the beginning of her reputation.

Soon after this Miss Arnold wrote Zachary's First Year at School. Miss Arnold was first generally known to New England educators through an appearance at a teachers' convention in Bethlehem, New Hampshire, several years after she had made a reputation in the West as a school supervisor in Minneapolis. There, among college presidents and all the best-known educators of the region, Miss Arnold made an address that held her hearers' attention for more than an hour.

It was past the time for dinner when she finished, and yet the applause which greeted her was tremendous. It was like an encore, and while the audience was still clapping, Miss Arnold arose and said in her quiet way that she was reminded of a small boy, Sammie, whose mother was always calling him, and one day when she had shouted "Sammie, Sammie," for a long time, and Sammie had sat unresponsive, the boy at last looked up.

"Say!" he asked, "do ye really want me or was ye just hollering?"

Secretary Long's Idea of Informality

This story relates to Secretary of the Navy Long's idea of social formality. Just before the first Cabinet dinner was given last season, Mr. Hay had a private talk with his colleagues in the Cabinet, in which the proposition was agreed to that the irritating precedent question at Cabinet dinners should be abolished. Each hostess must simply be careful not to put the same people together through the season. The Secretary of State was to inaugurate the plan. No one expressed himself as more rejoiced over the change than the Secretary of the Navy. He talked about it constantly between the agreement and the dinner.

When he arrived at the men's dressing-room the evening of the dinner, the man-servant handed him the usual small envelope with the name of the lady whom he was to take in to dinner. Mr. Long read it aloud to the other members of the Cabinet in the room. He looked puzzled and distressed. The other members showed that they also had cards.

Mr. Long sat heavily down in a chair and looked around them as one who had lost his last friend. "I thought," he said mournfully, "that Hay told us this was going to be an informal affair."

"What did you expect?" asked a Cabinet minister.

"Why, I thought every fellow would come in, and just go to the lady he liked best, take her out to dinner and sit down in the chair nearest him. That's my idea of informality."

The Recreations of a Famous Chemist

A few weeks ago a convention was called in Washington, D. C., composed of delegates from every incorporated association and college of medicine and pharmacy in this country. It is called only once every ten years and its object is the revision of the United States Pharmacopœia. The chairman of the committee of this revision is Dr. Charles Rice, the official chemist of the Department of Charities of New York City, and it is safe to say that he was the central figure of this as he was of the previous meetings of the congress which he has attended. For twenty years he has been the editor of this great undertaking and it has been largely a labor of love. Doctor Rice lives at Bellevue Hospital. He owns the finest private pharmaceutical reference library in the world.

The doctor is a recluse and, outside of the officials and inmates of Bellevue, he rarely sees anybody. He sleeps only a few hours a day and spends all his other time in work. One of the physicians at the hospital recently asked him what his recreations were and he answered:

"Making friends with little children and studying the Oriental languages. The best time I ever had in my life was spent upon the revising of the Sanscrit dictionary for the Russian Philosophical Society."

An American Mandarin in Detroit

Dr. Heneage Gibbes, health officer of Detroit, enjoys the distinction of being the only Chinese mandarin to hold an American office. He acquired his title after a series of adventures that would make Sinbad the Sailor look to his laurels. Doctor Gibbes is an Englishman by birth. He ran away from home when fourteen years old and went to sea. After several years as a sailor he was shipwrecked on the coast of China and fell into the hands of pirates, who took his clothing and turned the sailor loose in the garb of Nature. Finally he reached a Chinese town.

Then he fell in with an Englishman who gave him money for clothing on condition that Gibbes would work out the debt, and who informed him as soon as the bargain was closed that he would be expected to go into the camp of a rebel army to sell smuggled arms. The young Englishman never besitated and became an enemy of the Chinese Government.

From that he drifted into the Chinese service, was placed in command of a gunboat and set to patrolling the coast, looking for pirates and opium smugglers. He had a mixed crew composed of men from almost every nation on earth. But the crew was made up of fighters and Gibbes was successful in capturing some bad outlaws.

On one occasion he made a dash up a river which the smugglers practically controlled. He seized a cargo of contraband opium and made for the sea. But pirates and smugglers opened on his boat from the banks and gave him the closest kind of a call to capture. Once they tried to board his vessel with canoes and ran into a discharge of grape and cannister that tore them to pieces. Gibbes and his men escaped with an immense cargo of the captured narcotic, and when this was reported to the Government Gibbes was summoned into the presence of royalty and made a mandarin.

He went to England soon after to study medicine, then to India on the commission sent out to study cholera, and resigned to take the chair of pathology in Michigan University.

Senator Depew's Unfinished Speech

Senator Chauncey M. Depew recently made a trip to the South, and Charleston, South Carolina, is still gossiping over the things he did and said while a guest of the Gridiron Club. They will never forget how he danced the cake-walk with Little Red Riding Hood at Mrs. Andrew Symonds' Mother Goose party.

But he has just been confessing to his friends in Washington that it was at this party that he was "rattled" for the first time in his life while making a speech. The social life of Charleston and some surrounding cities was represented at the ball that night. Every one except Doctor Depew was dressed in the costume of a Mother Goose child. After the cake-walk, in which the Senator from New York showed that he was quite equal to the abandon of the occasion, the hostess asked him to make a speech to the "children."

He consented at once and stood up on a little platform at the far end where the orchestra was stationed. He admits that he began without qualms.

He spoke for about five minutes without creating either applause or comment. Then he used a word of four syllables. Suddenly the great audience of children ran toward him and pressed in on him, clapping their hands together, looking into his eyes beseechingly, the more venturesome pulling his coat-tails, and all crying out: "Oh, Mr. Depew, what does that word mean. Please spell it for us. We don't know any word like that down here." The Senator laughed and kept on with his speech, but the grown-up "children" wouldn't have it. They stamped the floor and cried aloud for him to spell the word for them. Then he was allowed to go on with his speech. This performance was repeated five times in the next ten minutes.

"I had to give up and apologize," he said. "I was completely 'rattled' for the first time in my public career."

"PUBLICK OCCURRENCES"

The American Boy's Great Day

There is one day in the year which belongs to the American boy, and that is the Fourth of July. How it has gradually come into his possession is one of the most interesting developments of American life. A hundred years ago the day was celebrated, but those who took part in the functions were youths and men. The boys had to be satisfied to stand by the roadside—there were no paved streets in those days—and watch the processions. If they got a cake or two, or a glass of spruce beer, they were very lucky. The elders had all the fun, and ate and drank most of the refreshments.

It went on this way for years, but gradually in the evolution of things the American boy came into his own. In fact, the American boy to-day is about ten years older at the same age than he was a century ago, and he has much more liberty. It is to his credit that, as a rule, he uses his opportunities sensibly and decorously, and although he is apt to be a bit boisterous and to have a certain contempt for laws against pyrotechnics, his enthusiasm is genuine and his methods are clean and above board. He will run from the policeman, but he will seldom lie to him when caught.

The old people continually deplore the forwardness of the children of this day and generation. Some old maids have written books about it. But, to use a good American simile, it is "as sure as shooting" that the next generation will be more forward than the one that is now coming on. The American boy takes no steps backward—he is increasing his record as a sprinter every year. All things aid him in this course. Education comes easier to him, travel is open to him, the world seems smaller. Invention has made miracles tame and his powers of credulity are never strained. Even the thrilling intricacies of the three-ring circus scarcely cause him to lift an eyebrow.

The Father of Independence Day

It is curious that the man who is called the father of the Fourth of July, John Adams, predicted the picturesque development of the anniversary. To his wife he wrote, after the Declaration of Independence had been signed: "I am apt to believe that it will be celebrated by successive generations as the great anniversary festival. It ought to be commemorated as the day of deliverance by solemn acts of devotion to God Almighty. It ought to be solemnized with pomp and parade, with shows, games, sports, bonfires and illuminations, from one end of the continent to the other, from this time forward, for evermore."

The spiritual part of this conviction seems to have been forgotten, but the other features have been religiously developed. It will be remembered that in Daniel Webster's eulogy on Adams and Jefferson, he makes Adams the prophet of the Fourth of July, and he puts in his mouth the speech which nearly every schoolboy has repeated, including these words: "We shall make this a glorious, an immortal day. When we are in our graves our children will honor it. They will celebrate it with thanksgiving and with festivities, with bonfires and illuminations. On its annual return they will shed tears; copious, gushing tears, not of subjection and slavery, not of agony and distress, but of exultation and gratitude and of joy." It is true that the children do shed tears, copious, gushing tears, but they generally come from the toy cannon or the toy pistol or the premature firecracker. And the doctor does the rest.

The first year after the signing of the Declaration of Independence the anniversary was celebrated in Philadelphia, where Congress was then meeting, and John Adams viewed the parade, listened to the volleys of guns and the music by a captured Hessian band, and at night pronounced it the most splendid illumination he had ever seen. That was at a time when even the coal-oil lamp was unknown, and the humble tallow dip was about the best that could be had. What would he say next Wednesday night if he could stand in one of our big cities or towns and view the electric lights and the glare of Greek fire and other illuminants! But in those days patriotism was so fierce that the tallow candle looked as big and as bright as an arc light of to-day. At the same time we need not underestimate the seriousness of modern loyalty, for beneath all the flare and noise there is real feeling. As the boy is, so is the man, and this logic leads us to the conclusion that we are indeed an enthusiastic nation.

The Exercises for the Elders

But of course the older people have to do something in celebration of the nation's birthday, and as a rule they do it with interest and thoroughness. If they can, they get an orator—one who will not talk too long; they have a band of music, and if possible they sing the national hymns, although as a rule this part of the program is rather lame, whether from modesty or lack of lung power it is difficult to say. In Boston, for instance, they have a series of Fourth of July orations that has gone far beyond the hundred mark, and that is kept up religiously. Congressman Fitzgerald was one of the orators several years ago. Boston gets through the speechmaking in the morning so that the people may enjoy themselves in the afternoon. Then there is a procession of soldiers followed in the evening by an exhibition of fireworks. Boston also throws open the public halls with free entertainments for the children. There are regattas on the water and balloons in the air, and people crowd in from the countryside. "All Boston people get out of town and all the country people come in on the Fourth of July" is Dr. Edward Everett Hale's witticism.

In other sections there are different observances. Out in Iowa, for instance, it is probable that such an orator as Congressman Robert G. Cousins, who is a native and who has represented his State in four Congresses, will be telling of the glories of the American flag, and not saying anything against Expansion. Congressman John Dalzell, of Pittsburg, and Congressman Babcock, of Wisconsin, who have been in numerous Congresses and who are among the orators, will be doing the same thing in some centres of their districts, and so it will go all through the country. The oratorical Congressmen seldom get a rest on the Fourth of July, and some of them make speeches in the morning, the afternoon and at night, too, but as they have long summer vacations with full pay this overwork need not cause any anxiety.

The Two Hymns of Independence Day

Our two national hymns are regularly attacked for their lack of good grammar and real poetry, but though they may have technical defects, they unquestionably possess that indefinable something which arouses the inward thrill. The Star-Spangled Banner, written on old envelopes by Francis Scott Key after the anxious night of the bombardment of Fort McHenry, was first sung in the theatre by a variety actor. It was simply introduced as "verses by a gentleman who had been detained on board the English fleet." There was no claque to exploit it, and, in fact, Mr. Key did not want to be known as its author, but fitting the words to an old tune, the actor, with a voice which was not at all extraordinary, so impressed the audience that the song had to be sung again and again and repeated on following nights.

Dr. Edward Everett Hale has said that of all Fourths of July in Boston that of 1832 left the deepest mark in the history of the century. He said he had spent his last cent and bought medals, drunk root-beer, eaten oysters and other things, and was slowly returning home when at Park Street church he saw a procession of children entering. They were Sunday-school children. He followed, as any normal boy would, and went into the gallery. It was then and there that the hymn, My Country, 'Tis of Thee, was sung, the first time it had ever been sung in public. Happy fate that this hymn of the nation was consecrated on the national birthday!

The Old Celebrations and the New

Last year it was estimated that there were almost as many casualties from Fourth of July celebrations as in the War with Spain. This, of course, did not include typhoid fever or diseases, but simply the accidents from gunpowder and the different explosives. The same hue and cry will undoubtedly be raised this year; it has been regularly raised ever since the first anniversary in 1777, and it will be just as popular a hundred years hence as it is now. As with the protest against football, it only serves to increase the interest of the sport. The one thing the boys can remember this year while they are firing off the crackers is that fireworks originated in China, where proceedings somewhat more serious than pyrotechnics are now going on. From a mere explosive the firework has been developed into a wonderful spectacle, and it is really extraordinary how the colors and figures are so curiously and so beautifully arranged.

A hundred years ago the Fourth of July was a general celebration by each community; there were long speeches, the reading of the Declaration of Independence, music, shooting matches and a great deal of food and drink, especially drink. Now the day is broken up into as many circles as there are settlements and social coteries. Each summer hotel has its own fireworks. Each group of cottages or of friends has its program, and in almost every case the arrangements are for the pleasure of the children. It is the one holiday in all the year when the fathers and the uncles and the bachelor visitors work the hardest to make the youngsters have a good time, and of all the taskmasters in the world there is none to compare with the boys and girls on the Fourth of July. Any one who has followed the average boy on the Fourth of July from early dawn till bedtime need not wonder at the exploits of the American soldiers in capturing San Juan Hill or in the following of Aguinaldo throughout the length and breadth of Luzon.

The Birthplace of Our Independence

A visit was paid the other day to the old Independence Hall, where you may see the portraits of the signers, the chairs in which they sat, the inkstand that they used and a lot of other things, chief of which, of course, is the Liberty Bell with its immortal crack. It was a hot summer day, but the old place that has been made as new was cool—so cool that even the fat policeman who guards the medals that are for sale and the registry book wherein visitors inscribe their names looked as comfortable as the proverbial cucumber. Two young men who had wheeled half way across the continent had just left their autographs.

"How many visitors do you have in the course of the day?" was asked.

"Oh, they are coming and going all the time—they'll average about three hundred a day, I guess."

"And on the Fourth of July? Is there a crowd here all day?"

"It's about the same as at other places—quite a number in the morning, but hardly anybody the rest of the day. So far as that goes, we had just as well shut up after twelve on the Fourth."

So here it is in the very home of the Day, in the very centre which is within an hour or so of millions of good Americans.

Then a look at the book! Visitors from every part of the world, from every State in the Union, from country and city, a wide area of land and humanity!

So the interest exists. It is Liberty's birthday, and whatever may be said of the way in which it is celebrated, there can be no question about the earnestness that underlies the occasion, no doubt as to the conviction of nearly eighty millions of people that they have the cleanest flag that floats and the biggest and best thing in the way of government that history has ever known.

Tales of the Credit Man

By Harlow N. Higinbotham

II—Duties, Difficulties and Dangers of the Credit Desk

THE first routine duty which the credit man discharges each morning, as soon as he reaches his desk, is that of looking at the business thermometer of the house. No other term so precisely describes the nature of the day's financial correspondence. By the time he has glanced at the stack of alternating letters and drafts with which his desk or basket is heaped he has as clear an idea of the "condition of the trade" as if he had made a tour of inspection and called upon a large number of representative customers. More than this, he looks through the glass of his correspondence and reads the character and the situation of each individual customer who has contributed a letter to that morning's mail.

A Glance at the Business Thermometer

Here is the terse, formal letter of the man of methodical habits who merely makes his letter the record of the draft with which it is accompanied; but the latter may be relied upon as being correct in amount and kind, and it is safe to take the absence of any complaint from this customer as a confession of his satisfaction with the manner in which the house has handled his business. Then there is the man who never sends a remittance without a complaint of some kind to keep it company. Here, also, is the man who has overstepped his discount time by a narrow margin, and thinks to make good this delay by apologies and arguments. The stories which these letters tell might be continued almost indefinitely, and in great variety; but the point is made if it is clear that the standing of the country merchant is determined by the contents of these letters; and the real credit man reads "between the lines" as swiftly as he scans each sheet. Even the remittances themselves indicate the character of their senders.

The moment the eye of the credit man detects the presence of a customer's personal check drawn on a local bank the standing of that customer suffers. The chief of the credit desk realizes that this man has sent an unbankable remittance through carelessness, through ignorance of metropolitan business methods and requirements, or to save the exchange fee sometimes charged by local bankers. No matter what the motive for sending a personal check in place of a draft upon the city bank, the result is not helpful to the reputation of the sender, so far as his relationship to the wholesale house is concerned. These checks should be returned with the information that they are not bankable in the city, and that, therefore, they should be replaced with bankable funds. This means annoyance and delay.

Decision on a Doubtful Order

After the remittance letters are disposed of the maker of credit takes up the orders. There is something like a perpetual contest between these two classes of documents, and the complementary relationship between them must be held constantly in mind by the credit man as he scans them. With one hand, so to speak, he sends the remittances to the cashier, and with the other hand deals out the orders to the salesmen. It is "nip and tuck" between them, as a remittance received by the same mail with the order may decide whether or not the goods called for in the latter will be sent.

Whenever he encounters an order about which he feels the slightest doubt he holds it out for inquiry and consideration, and places his OK upon those which pass without challenge. Under ordinary circumstances, each doubtful order receives a quick impression from a rubber stamp, which reads as follows:

Owes $——
Due $——
Bot. $——
H. C. $——
H. P. ——

In this list H. C. stands for "highest credit," and H. P. abbreviates "how pays." Each order is taken by a boy to the ledger in which the customer's account is carried, and the information called for by the stamp is filled in. Let it be supposed that the entry comes back as follows:

Owes $ 375
Due $ 000
Bot. $4560
H. C. $ 780
H. P. Promptly

This showing would be taken in at a glance, and an OK placed on the order, which would be hurried to the sales department. But suppose the boy returned from the ledger with this record:

Owes $4500
Due $2150
Bot. $5500
H. C. $4500
H. P. Slow

Then the credit man would instruct the boy to bring him the "information" on that customer's account. The lad would go to a formidable record where would be found all the detailed information calculated to shed light upon the financial standing and character of the merchant in question. The bookkeeper also would be called upon to contribute to the testimony on which the fate of the order must be decided. This addition to the evidence would be a statement of the items represented by the $2150 already due.

Letter Writing Not a Lost Art

A letter would then be dictated to the customer, calling his attention to the amount overdue, and also informing him of the credit man's decision on the shipment of the goods called for in the latest order. The tone of the letter should accurately express the attitude of the house to the customer, shading the degree of latitude of leniency allowed him, or dealing out censure and limitations according to the extent and gravity of the delinquencies.

A copy of the statement is handed to the assistant credit man with instructions to follow the matter up in five days, for instance. The assistant enters the customer's name in his diary five days ahead of date, and drops the statement into an index portfolio. In five days the name is met with on the diary page, and the statement taken from the portfolio. Then a new statement is procured from the bookkeeper, and the cashier is also consulted, as the morning's mail may have brought a remittance from the tardy customer.

Action of some kind is then decided upon by the chief credit man, to whom the documents are passed. He will take such decisive steps as he believes the situation demands and his customer will tolerate. To know just the right and effective thing to do in ninety-nine of every one hundred of these cases is to be a credit man.

While these doubtful orders are being investigated and disposed of and correspondence of every kind attended to, the credit man is constantly interrupted by prospective customers who wish to open accounts and are anxious to get as liberal a line of credit as possible.

On Trial Before the Credit Desk

Naturally, they dread this ordeal, for modern credit making methods have become so exact, scientific and searching that this preliminary examination is bound to bring to light, as a rule, any weakness in the business condition of the customer, and expose any flaws in his statement of the case. At the same time the credit man must occupy a diplomatic attitude; he must hold that every applicant for credit is a desirable customer until the contrary shall be established. And he must take good care, too, not to give offense to the candidate for credit while probing for any possible weakness in his financial condition. No matter how large or pressing the correspondence awaiting his attention, the credit man must hear all his caller has to say; he must be patient, courteous and resourceful, and, if he is wise, he will seek to prolong instead of curtail the interview.

Naturally, the customer feels that the meeting is an important one, and wishes time in which to present his case in the best possible light, and to give the credit man the most favorable idea of his affairs. If there is the slightest suspicion in his mind that his story is wearisome he feels that the importance of his business is not appreciated. Nothing is so well calculated to give the customer a satisfied and friendly feeling toward the house as the knowledge that the credit man has listened with apparent interest to every word he has wished to offer, and that his plea has been as full and fair as could be wished.

Courtesy to the Customer

Then there is another side to this matter of giving the prospective customer all the time he wishes in which to place his affairs before the credit man. Many men, and particularly those not accustomed to the rush and snap of metropolitan business methods, are not able to tell the most important things they have to say until after a certain amount of preliminary conversation. They do not "strike their gait" at the start, and have to "warm up" gradually to the main business in hand. Often this is the result of embarrassment, and in other cases it is simply the result of being accustomed to doing business in a less precipitate way.

At any rate, the credit man frequently finds that the most valuable information he is able to get out of the country merchant who calls at his desk cannot be secured until the caller has become accustomed to his immediate surroundings and has talked of the crops in his locality, of his town, of his family and other topics which he is accustomed to discuss at home as a kind of formal introduction to the more serious business under consideration. After this personal ground has been covered, it is the fault of the credit man if he fails to gather a fair idea of his man and the latter's surroundings. Very likely some chance remark dropped by the merchant after he seems to have finished his plea and has fully gained his ease will be the one bit of information which will determine the result of the whole conference.

The Personal Equation in Credit Problems

In this connection let me emphasize what may at first appear a trivial point. Learn where the man who seeks credit came from as well as where he is located at the moment. If he replies in general terms, naming only the State or general section of the country, persist until you know his former town. A disinclination on a customer's part to be explicit in answering a question of this kind is sometimes good ground for suspicion. Then, if he names as his "old home" a place with which you are personally familiar a pleasant bond of association is instantly established.

Once a Scandinavian came to my desk and asked credit. In the course of our talk I asked him where he came from, and he gave the name of a certain provincial town in Sweden. "Why," I exclaimed, "I spent one of the pleasantest winters of my life in that quaint old place!" This remark brought me closer to the man than years of casual business acquaintanceship could have done. He was delighted that I was familiar with the haunts of his boyhood.

Frequently the caller will mention a city in which the credit man has acquaintances—perhaps the local banker, a lawyer, or the station-agent—and there is a decided advantage in having the customer know that his town contains men with whom you are in touch. The value of this may be in putting the merchant on his "good behavior," as it were, or in giving him the comfortable feeling that you stand in a little closer relationship to his town than to some others. All these details are more important than they might appear, and he is a wise credit man who does not neglect one of them. Any item of information which gives a clearer idea of the community in which a customer lives, of the physical characteristics of the locality, its crops, its industries, its resources of every kind, is worth remembering. Often, too, a merchant will drop a word about his family affairs which may have a direct and practical bearing on the standing which he should have with his wholesale house. If his wife or child is an invalid, if his son is wayward or profligate, or if his household is phenomenally large, it stands to reason that he is carrying a heavy burden of private expense, and this will naturally have a decided bearing on his business success. Although he may not have to cripple his business in order to keep up private expenses, the burden of this family care and anxiety may so prey upon his thought and energy as to sap his vitality and make him discouraged or, perhaps, indifferent to his business. Therefore, know your customer, know the town in which he is located, and know the community from which he originally came.

Assurance Made Doubly Sure

But to return to the routine of the credit desk after the caller has been interviewed and has taken his leave. The credit man's approval of an order does not ship the goods therein listed. If it did he would be saved a large volume of detail work. He must have the last as well as the first word on every separate transaction that each customer has with the house. Before him are placed stacks of shipping tickets, on each of which must be stamped his approval before the goods are released and actually shipped.

This is a wise and necessary precaution, as some vital change may have taken place in the affairs of the merchant since the approval of the order. Perhaps a salesman has telegraphed that he has picked up information on the road which leads him to believe the merchant is in a "shaky" condition, or that a rival house has become suspicious and may be expected to close up the retailer's store at any moment. Or the friendly banker or lawyer or station-agent in the merchant's town may have sent in a quiet tip to the effect that in some way or other the applicant's prosperity is threatened. Any one of a hundred contingencies may make it judicious to hold up the shipment until further developments are had. Consequently, the credit man scans each shipping ticket, asks himself if there is any reason why the goods should not leave the house, and if there is not he stamps his OK upon the ticket. If the house is a large one, the amount of this ticket work is heavy and burdensome. In one day I have personally examined and stamped seventeen hundred of these tickets in addition to doing all other routine duties of the desk.

The Limits to Advice and Aid

Not a little of the credit man's time is required to answer the inquiries of his business neighbors and to send his messengers on similar errands. It should be understood, however, that it is not customary for competitors to exchange information. As a rule, this is done only between houses in different lines of trade. The wholesale shoe house and the dry-goods establishment occupying the same territory have, broadly speaking, the same customers.

Editor's Note—This is the second of a series of four papers which began in The Saturday Evening Post of June 23. The series will be continued in early numbers.

John Smith, from Tipton, Iowa, conducts a general store, we will say, and decides to open an account with a wholesale shoe house. The credit man of that establishment sends to the wholesale dry-goods house around the corner, and asks the credit man there:

"Do you sell Smith, of Tipton?" The answer comes:

"Yes; he is good for a line of $3000."

An hour later the shoe house may be called upon to make a return of this courtesy. There is little temptation to furnish misleading information, as the houses are in different lines of trade, and their interests do not conflict. At the same time it is well for the young credit man not to rely too implicitly upon the advice of a neighbor. The degree of his reliance must depend upon the faith he has in the honesty and the shrewdness of the credit man whom he consults.

It is hardly a safe practice for two houses in the same line to attempt an exchange of information concerning credits. Were both to act in perfectly good faith it would be inevitable that disappointments and complications would sooner or later arise to shake this confidence and give the impression that there had been a deliberate violation of faith. Certainly the temptation would be strong so to manipulate information as to shift upon a competitor the burden of hazards, keeping the safe customers as exclusively as possible from the latter.

Common Errors of Credit Men

One of the most common and disastrous causes of failure among credit men is a lack of thoroughness in so interviewing a prospective customer at the start as to sift his responsibility to almost a scientific certainty. This tendency arises from an unwillingness to give each individual case a requisite amount of time and attention. Too often the interview which decides the limit of a man's credit is hurried through. In credits, as in law, "possession is nine points." Once a man is given a certain length of credit, it cannot be reduced without danger of giving serious offense.

The credit man feels this peril and will go to great expenditure of time and patience in attempting to educate the customer up to good business methods rather than to contract his limit of credit. Hours are spent by the conscientious credit man in the attempt to coach his customers into safer and sounder practice. Here the advisory functions of the credit man come into play; and if he has himself lived on a farm and worked in a country store he has an immense advantage, for his words will be listened to and will carry weight with the customer because backed by practical experience.

The Necessity for Close Analysis of Conditions

However, a large amount of this work of training customers will be obviated by making the credit a sound and conservative one at the start. The credit man may get from his customer all the information requisite for a safe credit, and then fail to act judiciously through an inability to analyze the facts thus secured. This failure to go to the bottom of conditions and to see the weak point of very plausible situations is a common and an easy fault, and it often arises with reference to a customer who has long been an excellent and a trusted patron.

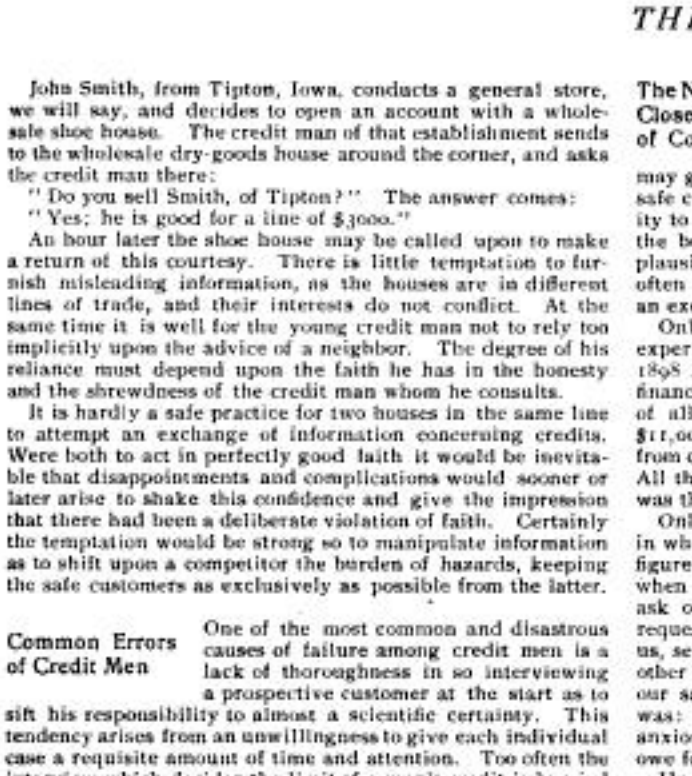
Only recently an instance of this nature arose in my own experience which may illustrate this point. At the close of 1898 I received from a certain customer a statement of his financial condition. This was of the regulation kind asked of all customers; it showed he had real estate valued at $11,000, cash $5000 and $2500 worth of wool, and was free from debt. In other words, he had a clear fortune of $18,500. All the other features of his showing were excellent, and he was therefore given a liberal credit.

Only a few months ago he asked for an extension of time in which to pay bills due and amounting to a considerable figure. I was informed that he had the same real estate as when his account was opened. However, I determined to ask of him another full statement of his affairs. At this request he became seriously offended, raised the money due us, settled his account, and declined to furnish the statement other than to say he had a stock of goods worth $20,000 which our salesman had reported in good condition. My answer was: "The fact mentioned in your letter makes us still more anxious for a complete statement, as it is evident you must owe for a large proportion of your stock."

Here was a very plausible showing, well calculated to tempt the unwary credit man in the habit of taking things for their face value without careful analysis. The fact that the man raised the money and paid his account simply proves that he was able to convince some other person of his financial soundness. I expect the future to show that my diagnosis was sound, and that I was not unduly conservative.

It might seem from what has already been said that the attitude of the credit man is naturally one of practical opposition to the salesman. The tendency is in that direction, but the salesman's side of the problem should never be lost sight of. I am inclined to believe that, as a general rule, the credit man has too little rather than too much fear of losing a good customer. Certainly a stiff, arbitrary and unyielding credit man can easily demoralize the selling department, and make the salesman feel that it is hardly worth his while to make special effort to get a new customer because of the likelihood that he will not pass muster at the credit desk. There is a reasonable conservatism in keeping with the spirit of progress and not opposed to taking a fair risk, and when this kind of moderation obtains in a credit department the salesmen are likely to understand its soundness and make little or no complaint. It is when the rulings of the credit man become exacting that it looks from the viewpoint of the salesman as if he were trying to keep away all customers instead of simply ruling out those that are not up to a fair standard of reliability. Then the salesmen are plunged into discouragement and charge their sorrows to the credit department.

The Deliberate Confidence Man



Probably no young man takes a responsible credit position without asking himself: "By what kind of a scheme am I most likely to be victimized?" The most common method of beating the credit man is that of "working" several cities at the same time and on the same basis of credit. Suppose the merchant in question to be located in a small town in the southern part of Illinois, near the Mississippi River. He comes to Chicago and says that he has decided to buy all his goods here because he can get better prices. His statement shows that he has $4000 in the local bank. As he only wishes for a credit of $3000 and a time limit of sixty days, the way seems very clear, particularly as the bank verifies his statement regarding the condition of his banking account. The credit is given and the customer repeats this operation in two or three other cities not too far distant from his town. Then he turns about and sells out the goods by sensational methods and flees with the money. Usually this is soon after he has started in business.

A remedy against this kind of a game is to keep close track of every customer. If he appears to be piling up a very heavy stock of goods, and resorts to "catch tricks" in order to sell a large line of goods in a short time, seeming to be indifferent to the matter of prices, it is well to tighten the lines about him and double the diligence with which he is watched. But here is where the faculty to judge of a man's honesty by his bearing and appearance comes into play. With this intuition, backed by good ability as an interviewer and the power to analyze information after it is procured, the young credit man may reasonably hope to avoid any serious experiences with deliberate confidence men and rascals.

favorite promenade for the young people of the town at all seasons, even in winter.

At times when the jail was filled with disorderly inmates these innocent lovers could hear the wild yells and see the gestures of the men at the windows, but ordinarily the grounds were quiet and peaceful. The robins nested in the maples, the squirrels scampered from tree to tree, and little children tumbled about on the grass, unmindful of the sullen captives within the walls.

For seven years Harold himself had played about this yard, hearing the wild voices of the prisoners and seeing men come and go in irons. Over these walks he had loitered with Dot—now he was one of those who clawed at the window bars like monkeys in a cage in order to look out at the sunshine of the world. The jail pallor was already on his face and a savage look was in his eyes. He refused to see any one but Jack, who came often and whose coming saved him from despair.

In one respect the county jail was worse than the State's prison; it had nothing for its captives to do. They ate, amused themselves as best they could through the long day, and slept. Most of them brooded, like Harold, on the sunshine lost to them and paced their cells like wild animals. It had, however, the advantage of giving to each man a separate bed at night, though during the day they occupied a common corridor. Some of them sang and others cursed their fellows for their stupidity, and fights were not uncommon among them.

The jailer was inclined to allow Harold more liberty after his trial, but the boy said: "I'm not asking any favors from you. I'm working out a sentence."

He continued his systematic exercise, eating regularly and with care in order that he should keep his health. He spent several hours each day leaping up the stairway which led from the lower cells to the upper, and his limbs were like bundles of steel rods. He could spring from the floor, catch the hand-rail of the run-way above and swing himself with a single effort to the upper cells. Every possible combination of strength and agility, which the slender variety of means allowed, he used, and not one of all the prisoners cared to try muscular conclusions with him. Occasionally a new prisoner would experiment, but those who held over knew better than to "bother the kid." When a rash man tried it, he repented it in cotton cloth and arnica.

The only way in which Harold could be enticed into the residence part of the jail was by sending Jack to him.

At such times the jailer gave him plenty of time and Harold poured forth his latest plans in a swift torrent. He talked of nothing but the West. "My sentence will be out in April," he said; "just the right time to go. You must make all arrangements for me, old man. You take my money and get these things for me. I want a six-shooter, the best you can find, the kind they use out on the plains, and a belt and ammunition. I want a valise—a good strong one; and I want you to put all my clothes in it—I mean my underclothes. I won't need cuffs and collars and such knickknacks out there. Then I want you to be on the lookout for a chance to drive cattle for somebody going West. We'll find chances enough, and we'll strike for Abilene and your uncle's place. I haven't money enough to carry me out there on the train. Oh! won't it be good fun when we have a good horse apiece and go riding across the plains herding the long-horns! That's life, that is! If I'd only gone last year, out where the buffalo and the antelope are!"

At such times the eagle's heart in the youth could scarcely endure the pale, cold light of the prison. For an hour after

Synopsis of Previous Chapters.—The village of Rock River had been shaken to its foundations. Dot Rutland had eloped with the head clerk of the leading town bank. The day after, Harry Excell, who passed for her sweetheart, in a quarrel with a young bully of the town, stabbed him lightly, and was arrested for assault. Proud, overbearing and self-centred, young Excell would give no explanation to his father, the Rev. John Excell, or to his chum, Jack Burns, but the town put two and two together, and shrewdly suspected that Clint Slocum, the man wounded, had taunted him beyond endurance and attacked him with a heavy whip. The Court found the prisoner guilty of assault with intent to do injury. Upon recommendation for mercy the sentence was commuted to six months in the county jail.

FIFTH CHAPTER—THE EAGLE'S EYES GROW DIM

THE county jail in Cedar County was a plain, brick structure set in the midst of the Court House Square. Connected with it was the official residence of the Sheriff, and brick walks ran diagonally from corner to corner for the convenience of citizens. Over these walks magnificent maples flung gorgeous banners in autumn, and it was a and Sankey hymns, and the leader prayed resoundingly, and then, one by one, the others made little talks to the prison walls. There was seldom a face to be seen. Muttered curses occasionally rumbled from the cells where the prisoners were trying to sleep.

But the leader was a persistent young man, and not many Sundays after his initial attempt the prisoners were amazed to hear female voices joining in the songs. Heads appeared at every door to see the girls, who stood timidly behind the men and sang (in quavering voices) the songs that persuaded to grace.

Some of these girlish messengers of mercy Harold knew, but others were strange to him. The seminary was in session again and new pupils had entered. For the most part they were colorless and plain, and the prisoners ceased to show themselves during the singing.

Harold lay on his iron bed, dreaming of the wild lands whose mountains he could see shining through his prison walls. Jack had purchased for him some photographs of the Rocky Mountains, and when he desired to forget his surroundings he had but to look on the seamless dome of Sierra Blanca, or the San Francisco peaks, or at the image of the limpid waters of Trapper's Lake, and, like the conjurer's magic crystal sphere, it cured him of all his mental maladies, set him free and a-horse.

But one Sabbath afternoon he heard a new voice, a girl's voice so sweet and tender and true, he could not forbear to look out upon the singer. She was small and looked very pale under the white light of the high windows. She was singing alone, a wonderful thing in itself, and in her eyes was neither fear nor maidenly shrinking; she was, indeed, thrillingly absorbed and self-forgetful. There was something singular and arresting in the poise of her head. Her eyes seemed to look through and beyond the prison walls, far into some finer, purer land than any earthly feet had trod, and her song had a touch of genuine poetry in it:

"If I were a voice, a persuasive voice,
That could travel the whole earth through,
I would fly on the wings of the morning light
And speak to men with a gentle might
And tell them to be true—
If I were a voice."

The heart of the boy expanded. Music and poetry and love were waked in him by the voice of this singing girl. To others she was merely simple and sweet; to him she was a messenger. The vibrant, wistful cadence of her voice when she uttered the words "And tell them to be true," dropped down into the boy's sullen and lonely heart—he did not look at her, but all the week he wondered about her. He thought of her almost constantly, and the words she sang lay in his ears, soothing and healing like some subtle Oriental balm. "On the wings of the morning light" was one haunting phrase; the other was, "And tell them to be true."

The other prisoners had been touched. Only one or two ventured coarse remarks about her and they were speedily silenced by their neighbors. Harold was eager to see Jack in order to learn the girl's name, but Jack was at home, sick of a cold, and did not visit him during the week.

On the following Sunday she did not come, and the singing seemed suddenly a bitter mockery to Harold, who sought to solace himself with his pictures. The second week wore away and Jack came, but by that time the image of the girl had taken such aloofness of position in Harold's mind that he dared not ask about her, even of his loyal chum.

At last she came again, and when she had finished singing Not Half Has Ever Been Told, some prisoner started hand-clapping and a volley of applause made the cells resound. The girl started in dismay, and then, as she understood the meaning of this noise, a beautiful flush swept over her face and she shrank swiftly into shadow.

But a man from an upper cell bawled: "Sing The Voice, Miss! Sing The Voice!"

The leader of the band said: "Sing for them, Miss Yardwell."

Again she sang If I Were a Voice, and out of the cells the prisoners crept, one by one, and, at last, Harold. She did not see him till she had finished the last verse, and then he stood so close to her he could have touched her, and his solemn dark eyes burned so strangely into her face that she shrank away from him in awe and terror. She knew him—no one else but the minister's son could be so handsome and so refined of feature.

"You're that voice, Miss," one of the men called out.

"That's right," replied the others in chorus.

The girl was abashed, but the belief that she was leading these sinners to a merciful Saviour exalted her and she sang again. Harold crept as near as he could—so near he could see her large gray eyes, into which the light fell as into a mountain lake. Every man there perceived the girl's divine purity of purpose. She was stainless as a summer cloud—a passionless, serene child, with the religious impulse strong within her. She could not have been more than seventeen years of age, and yet so dignified and composed was her attitude she seemed a mature woman. She was not large, but she was by no means slight, and though colorless, her pallor was not that of ill health.

Her body resembled that of a sturdy child, straight in the back, wide in the waist and meagre of bosom.

Her voice and her eyes subdued the beast in the men. An indefinable personal quality ran through her utterance, a sadness, a sympathy and an intuitive comprehension of the sin of the world unusual in one so young. She had been carefully reared—that was evident in every gesture and utterance. Her dress was a studiously plain, gray gown, not without a little girlish ornament at the neck and bosom. Every detail of her lovely personality entered Harold's mind and remained there. He had hardly reached the analytic stage in matters of this kind, but he knew very well that this girl was like her song; she could die but never deceive. He wondered what her first name could be: no girl like that would be called "Dot" or "Cad." It ought to be Lily or Marguerite. He was glad to hear one of the girls call her Mary.

He gazed at her almost without ceasing, but as the other convicts did the same he was not observably devoted, and whenever she raised her big, clear eyes toward him, both shrank, he from a sense of unworthiness, she from the instinctive fear of men which a young girl of her type has deep planted within her. She studied him shyly when she dared, and after the first song sang only for him. She prayed for him when the hand knelt on the stone floor, and at night in her room she plead for him before God.

The boy was smitten with a sudden sense of his crime, not in the way of a repentant sinner, but as one who loves a sweet and gentle woman. All that his father's preaching and precept and example could not do, all that the judge, jury and prison could not do, this slip of a girl did with a glance of her big gray eyes and the tremor of her voice in song. All his misdeeds arose up suddenly as a wall between him and the girl singer. His hard heart melted. The ugly lines went out of his face and it grew boyish once more, but sadder than ever.

His was not a nature to rest inactive. He poured out a hundred questions to Jack who could not answer half a dozen of them.

"Who is she? How old is she? Where does she live? Do you know her? Is she a good scholar? Does she go to church? Does she go to parties? Does she dance?"

Jack replied as well as he was able. "She's a queer kind of a girl. She don't dance or go to parties at all. She's an awful fine scholar. She sings in the choir. Most of the boys are afraid to speak to her, she's so distant. She just says "Yes," or "No," when you ask her anything. She's religious—goes to prayer-meeting and Sunday-school. About a dozen boys go to prayer-meeting just because she goes and sings. Her folks live in Waverly, but she boards with her aunt, Mrs. Brown. Now, that's all I can tell you about her. She's in some of my classes, but I daresent talk to her."

"Jack, she's the best and grandest girl I ever saw. I'm going to write to her."

Jack replied: "I wish you was out of here, old man."

Harold became suddenly optimistic. "Never you mind, Jack. It won't be long till I am. I'm going to write to her to-day. You get a pencil and paper for me quick."

Jack's admiration of Harold was too great to admit of any question of his design. He would have said no one else was worthy to tie Mary's shoe, for he, too, worshiped her—but afar off. He was one of those whom women recognize only as gentle and useful beings, plain and unobtrusive.

He brought the pad and pencil and sat by while the letter was written.

Harold's was not a nature of fine-drawn distinctions; he wrote as he fought, swift and determined, and the letter was soon finished, and read and approved by Jack.

"Now, don't you let anybody see you give that to her," Harold said in parting.

"Trust me," Jack stanchly replied, and both felt that here was business of greatest importance. Jack proceeded at once to walk on the street which led past Mary's boarding-place and hung about the corner, in the hope of meeting Mary on her return from school. He knew very exactly her hours of recitation and at last she came, her arms filled with books, moving with such stately step she seemed a woman, tall and sedate. She perceived Jack waiting, but was not alarmed, for she comprehended something of his goodness and timidity.

He took off his cap with awkward formality. "Miss Yardwell, may I speak with you a moment?"

"Certainly, Mr. Burns," she replied, quite as formally as he.

He fell into step with her and walked on.

"You know—my chum—" he began, breathing hard, "my chum, Harry Excell, is in jail. You see, he had a fight with a great big chap, Clint Slocum, and Clint struck Harry with a whip. Of course Harry couldn't stand that and he cut Clint with his knife; of course he had to do it, for you see Clint was big as two of him and he'd just badgered the life out of Harry for a month, and so they jugged Harry, and he's there—in jail—and I suppose you've seen him; he's a fine-lookin' chap, dark hair, well built. He's a dandy ball player and skates bully; I wish you could see him shoot. We're going out West together when he gets out of jail. Well, he saw you and he liked you, and he wrote you a letter and wanted me to hand it to you when no one was looking. Here it is; hide it, quick."

She took the letter, mechanically moved to do so by his imperative voice and action, and slipped it into her Algebra. When she turned to speak, Jack was gone, and she walked on, flushed with excitement, her breath shortened and quickened. She had a fair share of woman's love of romance and of letters, and she hurried a little in order that she might the sooner read the message of the dark-eyed, pale boy in the jail.

It was well she did not meet Mrs. Brown as she entered, for the limpid gray of her eyes was clouded with emotion. She climbed the stairs to her room and quickly opened the note. It began abruptly:

"Dear Friend: It is mighty good of you to come and sing to us poor fellows in jail. I hope you'll come every Sunday. I like you. You are the best girl I ever saw. I like you and

I don't want you to think I'm a hard case. I used up Clint Slocum because I had to. He had bectored me about enough. He said some mean things about me and some one else, and I soaked him once with my fist. He struck me with the whip and dowsed me, then a kind of a cloud came into my mind and I guess I soaked him with my knife, too. Anyhow, they jugged me for it.

"Well, now I'm in here and I'm sorry, because I don't want you to think I'm a tough. I've done a whole lot of things I had not ought to have done, but I never meant to do any one any harm.

"Now, I'm going West when I get out. I'm going into the cattle business on the great plains, and I'm going to be a rich man and then I'm going to come back. I hope you won't get married before that time for I'll have something to say to you. If you run across any pictures of the mountains or the plains I wisht you'd send them on to me. Next to you I like the life in the plains better than anything.

"I hope you'll come every Sunday till I get out.

"Yours respec'fly,

"HAROLD EXCELL.

"Jack will give this to you. Jack is my chum; I'd trust him with my life. He's all wool."

The girl sat a long time with the letter in her hand. She was but a child, after all, and the lad's words alarmed and burdened her, for the meaning of the letter was plain. It was a message of love and admiration, and though it contained no subtleties, it came from one who was in jail, and she had been taught to regard people in jail as lost souls, aliens with whom it was dangerous to hold any intercourse, save in prayer and Scripture. The handsome boy with the sad face had appealed to her very deeply and she bore him in her thoughts a great deal, but now he came in a new guise—as a lover, bold, outspoken and persuasive.

"What shall I do? Shall I tell Aunt Lida?" she asked herself, and ended by kneeling down and praying to Jesus to give the young man a new heart.

In this fashion the courtship went on. No one knew of it but Jack, for Mary could not bring herself to confide in any one, not even her mother, it all seemed too strange and beautiful. It was God's grace working through her, and her devoutness was not without its human mixture of girlish pride and exaltation. She worshiped him in her natural moments, and in her moments of religious fervor she prayed for him with impersonal anguish as for a lost soul. She did not consider him a criminal, but she thought him godless and rebellious toward his Saviour.

She wrote him quaint, formal little notes, which began abruptly, "My Friend." They contained much matter which was hortatory, but at times she became girlish and very charming. Gradually she dropped the tone which she had caught from revivalists and wrote of her studies and of the doings of each member of the class, and all other subjects which a young girl finds valuable material of conversation. She was just becoming acquainted with Victor Hugo and his resounding, antithetic phrases, and his humanitarian outcries filled her mind with commotion. Her heart swelled high with resolution to do something, to help the world in general and Harold in particular.

She was not one in whom passion ruled, the intellectual dominated the passional in her, and, besides, she was only a child. She was by no means as mature as Harold, although about the same age. Naturally reverent, she had been raised in a family where religious observances never remitted; where grace was always spoken. In this home her looks were seldom alluded to in any way and vanity was not in her. She had her lovelinesses: her hair was long and fair, her eyes were beautiful and her skin was of exquisite purity, like her eyes. Her charm lay in her modesty and quaint dignity, her grave and gentle gaze and in her glorious voice.

The Reverend Excell was pleased to hear that his son was bearing confinement very well and made another effort to see him. Simply because Mary wished it, Harold consented to see his father, and they held a long conversation, at least the father talked and the boy listened. In effect, the minister said:

"My son, I have forfeited your good will—that I know—but I think you do me an injustice. I know you think I am a liar and a hypocrite because you have seen me in rages and because I have profaned God in your presence. My boy, let me tell you, in every man there are two natures. When one is uppermost, actions impossible to the other nature become easy. You will know this, you should know it now, for in you there is the same murderous madman that is in me. You must fight him down. I love you, my son," he said, and his voice was deep and tremulous, "and it hurts me to have you stand aloof from me. I have tried to do my duty. I have almost succeeded in putting my worst self under my feet, and I think if you were to come to understand me you would not be so hard toward me. It is not a little thing to me that you, my only son, turn your face away from me. On the day of your trial I thought we came nearer to an understanding than in many years."

Harold felt the justice of his father's plea and his heart swelled with emotion, but something arose up between his heart and his lips and he remained silent.

Mr. Excell bent his great, handsome head and plead as a lover pleads, but the pale lad, with bitter and sullen mien, listened in silence. At last the father ended; there was a pause.

"I want you to come home when your term ends," he said; "will you promise that?"

Harold said, "No, I can't do that. I'm going out West."

"Will you come for a single day?"

"I shall not prevent you, my son, but I want you to come and take your place at the table just once. There is a special reason for this. Will you come for a single day?"

Harold forced himself to answer, "Yes."

Mr. Excell raised his head.

"Let us shake hands over your promise, my boy."

Harold arose and they shook hands. The father's eyes were wet with tears. "I can't afford to forfeit your good opinion," Mr. Excell went on, "especially now when you are leaving me, perhaps forever. I think you are right in going. There is no chance for you here; perhaps out there in the great West you may get a start. Of my shortcomings as a father you know, and I suppose you can never love me as a son should, but I think you will see some day that I am not a hypocrite, and that I failed as a father more through neglect and passion than through any deliberate injustice."

The boy struggled for words to express himself; at last he burst forth: "I don't blame you at all, only let me go where I can do something worth while."

The minister dropped his son's hand and a look of the deepest sadness came over his face. He had failed—Harold was farther away from him than ever. He turned and went out without another word.

That he had hurt his father Harold knew, but in exactly what other way he could have acted he could not tell. The over-anxiety on the father's part irritated the boy. Had he been less morbid, less self-accusing, he would have won. Harold passionately loved strength and decision, especially in a big man like his father, who looked like a soldier and a man of action, and who ought not to cry like a woman. If only he would act all the time as he did when he threw the Sheriff across the walk that day on the street. "I wish he'd stop preaching and go to work at something else," he said to Jack. The psychology of the father's attitude toward him was incomprehensible. He could get along very well without a father; why could not his father get along without him? He hated all this fuss, anyway. It only made him feel sorry and perplexed and he wished sincerely that his father would let him alone.

Jack brought a letter from Mary which troubled him.

"I am going home in March, a week before the term ends. Mother isn't very well and just as soon as I can I must go. If I do, you must not forget me."

Of course he wrote in reply, saying:

"Don't you go till I see you. You must come in and see me. Can't you come in when Jack does? He knows all about us; COME SURE. I can't go without a good-by kiss. Don't you go back on me now. Come."

"I'm afraid to come," she replied; "people would find out everything and talk. Besides, you mustn't kiss me. We are not regularly engaged, and so it would not be right."

"We'll be engaged in about two minutes if you'll meet me with Jack," he replied. "You're the best girl in the world and I'm going to marry you when I get rich enough to come back and build you a house to be in; I'm going out where the cattle are thick as grasshoppers, and I'm going to be a cattle king, and then you can be a cattle queen and ride around with me on our ranch, that's what they call a farm out there. Now, you're my girl and you must wait for me to come back. Don't you get impatient; sometimes a chap has a hard time just to get a start, after that it's easy. Jack will go with me; he will be my friend and share everything.

"Now you come and call me sweetheart and I'll call you angel, for that's what you are. Get to be a great singer, and go about the country singing to make men like me good; you can do it, only don't let them fall in love with you; they do that too, just the way I did, but don't let 'em do it for you are mine. You're my sweetheart.

"From your sweetheart,

"HARRY EXCELL, Cattle King."

Turned Down the Mayor

WHEN Colonel William L. Strong was Mayor of the city of New York he received a call one day from a lot of bright-eyed little boys from the vacation schools of the East Side. They were of foreign birth and parentage, but were so intense in their patriotism they won the Mayor's heart.

"What can I do for you, gentlemen?" asked the Mayor.

The chairman of the committee replied: "Mr. Mayor, we have great pleasure in informing you that we represent the School City of the Norfolk Street School of the metropolis. We come within your jurisdiction, and look up to you as our superior authority. We have conferred the freedom of our city upon you, and would esteem it a high honor if you would favor us with an official visit."

Colonel Strong thought a moment and responded: "Gentlemen, I thank you for your invitation. If it meets with your approval I will be down in half an hour."

The committee, overwhelmed with the prompt acceptance, bowed, fell over one another in shaking hands with the executive, and then ran at full speed for the school. They worked very hard and had the School City in full operation by the time Colonel Strong reached it in his carriage. To their surprise the visitor knew apparently as much about it as they did. He called up the police force and also the mimic fire and street-cleaning departments. He was pleased with everything he saw, and when the display was over he told the children how he felt. They applauded him to the echo.

"What would you do if you were real citizens?" he asked. "Would you reelect me Mayor?"

There was an awkward pause and then the chairman said as bravely as he could: "I'm afraid not, Mr. Mayor. It's George Klatzkie's turn next. Next year we might, though."

The Antics of "Bobs" on the Dead Line

THE spectacle of Lord Roberts, shriveled and seventy, plunging into the smoke and struggle in South Africa and emerging with "the garter" in one hand and a dukedom in the other, is exhilarating and suggestive in view of "the dead-line-at-fifty" discussion which has been raging for months past. Roberts, as an old man, who had fought his battles and won his medals, who had all to lose and nothing to gain, stayed at home during the early weeks of the war. And younger fighters, Methuen and Buller—Buller, hailed by admiring friends a human battering ram, who would smash through the Boers to Pretoria in the good old beefy British way—set out on the search for easy glory. What they got is recent and painful history for England.

Roberts and Kitchener—the younger man was expected to do the big things—were sent out as an eleventh-hour hope. For a few weeks Kitchener's picture loomed large in the papers; then he dropped out of sight. And in the end it was Lord Roberts, twenty years past the dead line, who fought out the war and won. When he found that the Boers did not do battle according to the books, he changed his tactics to suit their little ways. "Bobs" apparently did not know that he had been as good as dead for twenty years; and at seventy he showed ability to learn, to adapt himself to conditions instead of trying to conform them to his previous standards.

It is futile to lay down general laws; folly to apply them to individuals. Yet the dead-line-at-fifty heresy has been accepted as gospel by so many people that it is worth following up, with "Bobs" as a beacon. Undoubtedly there is a dead line. Some men have already passed it at thirty; others never reach it till they follow a clergyman feet first out of church. But every man has crossed it when he feels that he knows his business and can rest on his knowledge.

A young business man is naturally in touch with the new methods that revolutionize trade every few years in these rapid times; but the older one who keeps up with them is his equal and his superior by the weight of his added experience. For the professional man whose study lamp still burns, fifty is but a milestone on the road to greater power. And for him there is always something to be won and a new way to win it if the old one will not do. At seventy he is learning and planning and executing. He is climbing trees, like General Wheeler, to see what the enemy is up to; or drumming up wheat, like Mr. Armour, to freeze out the other youngster; or planning a great Home Rule program like that lively octogenarian, the late Mr. Gladstone. It's what a man is learning and doing, not what he knows and has done, that makes for youth and success. The ability to see new conditions and to meet them is the secret of youth's power in the world to-day. And so long as a man has that ability, the years count for nothing. You can draw a dead line behind him, but you can't catch and push him over it.

It is easy to dream big things in a hammock.

The Bad Spending of Good Money

THE immense growth of wealth in America during the last forty years has changed the standard of living for all classes to an extent which only close observers can measure. It is understating the facts to say that any workman can buy twice as much of any kind of necessary or comfort by the outlay of a day's wages as he could in the years before the Civil War. All classes have changed in as great a measure as this.

This increase is most visible, of course, in the accumulated wealth of the rich, and the impression is thus created that "the rich are growing richer and the poor poorer" as time goes on. But so long as but seven per cent. of the wealth of the nation is in the hands of the millionaires, and ninety-three per cent. is owned by the rest of us, we can observe their accumulation of fortunes with complacency. For are they not our servants after all is said? Is it not for us that their money for the most part has to be spent in earning profits and interest in supplying us with what we need and will pay for? No rich man can spend on himself more than a limited amount of a large fortune. The rest goes to procure for us things we should never have obtained if there were not some among us who have the power of accumulation.

Our rich people are generally of the class who have come by their wealth suddenly and have not yet acquired the art of using it gracefully. Some of them seem intent on the experiment of spending as much as possible, and in the most ostentatious way. It is this that has raised among us once more the question whether luxury is not morally wrong. The old economists defended it by the plea that it gave employment to the laboring classes, but later economists are obliged by Ruskin to ask whether the employment is worthy of human beings. And it certainly is not true that the employment is proportional to the outlay of wealth. Neither is it an answer that most of the definitions of luxury are arbitrary, and that what seems such in one age becomes a necessity in the next. The conception is one which corresponds to a moral actuality, and challenges more accurate definition.

The first element of the conception is that it is an outlay beyond the pleasure or other worthy satisfaction obtained. When a man lights his pipe with a five-dollar note, that is luxury, since he is wasting a form of power in accomplishing but a fraction of what it is capable of, and we infer that the element of ostentation enters into the act. He wants to impress us with the fact that he can throw away money if he pleases. And much of our reprehensible spending is of this sort, being intended to show what we can afford.

A second element in wrongful spending is that it is meant to obtain for us a pleasure we should be better without. Right spending can never be for what we value because others cannot have it as well as we. What we heartily wish all the world could enjoy with us, we may heartily enjoy, even although it be not possible for us to share it with all the world. What gives us enjoyment because it is the privilege of wealth, or culture, or of descent from eminent people, brings with it moral injury so long as we think of it as a personal monopoly and valuable as such. True enjoyment is like God's, in that it keeps open hand and open heart for all, and seeks no higher happiness than in sharing what we have with all we can help. —ROBERT ELLIS THOMPSON.

Hold fast and hold to the last is good advice, but do not try it with firecrackers.

Mixing Business and Sentiment

A CURRENT piece of gratuitous advice against "mixing business and sentiment" is of great importance to us just now, and the necessity is hard upon us to discriminate wisely. What is business and what is sentiment? Probably the quality of one's moral nature has a large influence upon the color given to any proposed policy or act. The bias of training, the force of local environment, personal interest and the draft upon conscience caused by all sorts of special circumstance combine to overcome what may be called the demand of practical duty. Safe, wholesome sentiment is quite a different thing from sentimentality. Sound business principle is not equivalent to an unscrupulous theory of trade and commerce.

The American people at this moment are feeling the urgent need of honesty with themselves in making the rearrangement of their business relations with the world, enforced by a sudden and stupendous change of conditions. It is too late to deny that the change has come. The wrangles of political parties, no matter how they may be settled by the ballot, cannot eliminate the fact that, as a nation, we have entered the world's field of business.

The question is not, shall we do business? That is not open for consideration. We are going to do business, and a mighty volume of it. No mind can comprehend the magnitude of our trade in the near future. But how far shall mere sentiment control or modify this tremendous current of activity which is setting forth in every direction from our country? Is there any special reason why our new trade channels shall be dammed or choked by obstacles and restrictions different from those heretofore tolerated in narrower streams of opportunity? Is commerce any more a matter of sentiment because it is widening and deepening with a sudden access of volume? Is trade with the Orient or the tropics any more a matter of conscience than trade with England, France and Germany? Shall we take a flabby or maudlin estimate of our national character because we suddenly arrive at a broadening of our national influence, power, prestige, dominion? This is not a partizan question; it is a question as broad as the world; it involves what no Presidential campaign can break up into "issues" and settle by election.

Unwise and demagogical discussion on the rostrum and appeals to romantic sentiment from the stump may weaken the national unity of judgment and so enfeeble the national grasp upon opportunity that we may lose a large part of that volume of business which is our just premium, won by as fair and clean means as any nation ever used in readjusting its relations with the world. A lofty sense of national honor is indispensable. A strong hold upon justice, purity and fairness must be had in all our transactions; but it will be a sorrowful day for us when we permit a romantic tradition and a diluted whey of sentiment to take the place of steadfast courage and unhesitating business enterprise in making the very most of the opportunities for national prosperity opened up by our recent splendid achievements in war and diplomacy. There is no reason for doubting our national honor merely because we are entering upon a new and grand era of development. The only sentiments which should be mixed with business should be those that have always governed safe, honorable and successful enterprises.

Steering the Ship of State

ON ANY issue which absorbs public attention, what is white with one party is black with the other, and what one extols as noble statesmanship exhibiting high moral aims the other denounces as a base surrender of constitutional principles, portending the overthrow of the liberties of the people. Politics seems to be a tug of war over the helm of the ship of state, giving occasion for perpetual alarm lest wild steering may cause a wreck. But the situation is not so dangerous as it appears to be.

History shows that changes in party control of the government do not produce alterations of public policy commensurate with the wide differences between parties in their views of national affairs. On the contrary, there is a general resemblance in the tendencies of the administration and in the course of the opposition no matter which parties occupy those positions respectively. At times it almost seems as if parties had accomplished a complete turn-about, each standing where the other used to stand. The explanation of this curious phenomenon is that performance and criticism are very different. The one is difficult, the other is easy. The one has to do with facts, which are stubborn; the other has to do with opinion, which is pliant. So when a party passes from opposition to administration it is confronted with conditions, and in the long run its conduct is moulded by those conditions into general conformity with the policy which the opposing party had pursued under similar circumstances. A marked instance of this is the way in which the old Jeffersonian party gradually developed a policy which could not be distinguished from the old Federalism save by fine distinctions. In a letter under date of May 22, 1823, Madison said:

"It is true that under a great change of foreign circumstances, and with a doubled population and more than doubled resources, the Republican party has been reconciled to certain measures and arrangements which may be as proper now as they were premature and suspicious when they were urged by the champions of Federalism."

Every party which rises to power goes through a similar experience and soon finds that circumstances alter cases. Our politics provide their own antidote for the bane of partizanship. The general course of political development is determined by influences far deeper than the ideas and opinions of politicians. The political storms which wreck the fortunes of candidates and party leaders are like the strife of the waves. In the depths move the great ocean currents unaffected by the commotion on the surface.

—HENRY JONES FORD.

Some men who think they are patriots are only partizans.

Uncle Sam Patriot or Pirate?

A CELEBRATION divided against itself cannot be a chorus. We have already had several Presidential conventions saying different things about the meaning of the American brand of Liberty, and we are about to have another which promises to denounce things in general. Next Wednesday there will be orators on one side of the town exploiting the glories of Expansion, and there will be just as much eloquence on the other side picturing in lurid colors the dangers of Imperialism. Some will want the flag to float from the rising of the sun to the going down thereof, from Greenland's icy mountains to Afric's coral strands, while others will demand that it cling to its old pole, and wave over the land of the free and the home of the brave, which district extends from the uttermost wildernesses of Maine, where, excepting summer boarders, "the hand of man has never set his foot," to where the Sierra Nevadas wash their golden toes in the pearly waves of the sunset sea. As for Uncle Sam, he will not be able to tell whether he is a patriot, a pirate or simply a politician.

Possibly the best plan, after all, will be the old one. If it doesn't rain assemble in the public square, sing My Country, 'Tis of Thee, get the village elocutionist to read the Declaration of Independence, and then after waking up sing The Star-Spangled Banner and disperse to the brow of the hill to watch the amateur artillerist shoot off the ancient cannon. Then lead him to the doctor and go home to dinner, driving afterward to the field to see the games, and getting all the delight you can when the umpire is mobbed. That may be better than quarreling over new-fangled problems, even if the innocent spectator does have his doubts about it.

Americans in Paris

A NUMBER of young Americans have written to me from Indiana and Wisconsin, from the South and the far West, asking a dozen and one questions about the Exposition. One young school teacher wants to know whether he can come to Paris, learn French, see the Exposition and live—all on a sum that would hardly suffice for a month's stay at Long Branch. A Philadelphia boy of nineteen writes that he has saved up enough for the trip, and wants me to find him a room in the Latin Quarter, where he can live economically. Two Western farmers are anxious to secure comfortable quarters in a farmhouse, not too far from Paris. A woman asks whether she can pay her expenses here by "keeping boarders." I have tried to answer these questions as best I can, but there is evidently room for a general statement of just what can and cannot be done in this city of the world's delight.

In the first place, then, it is impossible for one who does not know French and is not used to foreign travel to live cheaply in Paris. The average visitor would do best to go to one of the twenty tourists' agencies and arrange for his entire trip—steamship, railway, hotel, Exposition tickets and all—before he leaves America. He will be well enough taken care of, and in addition will know exactly what he has to spend. At the most imposing of these "agency" hotels the charges range from twenty-five to thirty dollars a week, including guides, interpreters, carriages and admission tickets to the Exposition. At the smaller hotels and pensions good board may be secured for fifteen and twenty dollars a week. Later in the season prices will be probably much higher. In any case, the stranger who does not know his way about will find it difficult to unearth just what he wants, and will save both time and money by putting himself in the hands of reliable professional agents. In the second place there is almost nothing for the American to do in Paris. The city swarms with American typewriters, clerks, interpreters, guides, governesses—all of whom were led hither by the ambition to see the Exposition and pay for it in work. I might sum it all up by saying: "Don't come to Paris without money, and, unless you are expert in travel, do not try to 'play it off your own bat.'"

Private Block Stops the Gap

The United States Pavilion, all white and gold, stands on the left bank of the Seine in the Street of Nations. May 12, not quite a month after the opening of the Exposition, it was "inaugurated," officially if not formally. Invitations had been sent out to the chosen few of the American colony, but at the last moment Commissioner Peck was swept away by a good democratic impulse, and invited, through the newspapers, all Americans in Paris to come to the fête. And they came. They came in thousands. It was an army—a laughing, pushing, thronging, cheering army of Americans. They swarmed into the building like homing bees. They blocked the Street of Nations. Paris had never seen anything quite like that before. It was a political convention and a first night at the opera rolled into one. The French police drew back helpless and amazed. The fifty college boys who made up "Peck's Guards" were left in charge of things. They did their best, but it was a forlorn hope. The American girl in her thousands swept down on them, routed them, captured the pavilion and looted the lunch-counter long before the chosen few with tickets of invitation arrived. The young guardsmen made up their minds that something must be done; they decided that they would admit no one else. Outside, a crowd of thousands swarmed around the entrances. They begged and threatened, but the young Horatii were like adamant.

I, too, wanted to get in; it was not so much the sandwiches and lemonade—though a sandwich eaten is always a sandwich to the good—as it was that one always wants to go in when he is told to stay out. At last I thought of the basement door. Down there the crowd was not quite so dense, and I elbowed my way to the front. The young guardsman said "Hello!" and I shook hands. The last time I saw him he was the manager of three theatrical companies in New York; his name, then as now, was Block.

"I'll let you in," he said, "though it's against orders. And I say, I wish you'd tell this duffer that he can't come in—tickets don't go. He's the most persistent chap I ever saw, and I can't make him understand plain United States."

I looked at the angry but dignified little man whom Private Block was keeping out.

"I think you had better let him in," I suggested; "they are probably waiting for him in there."

He was M. Caillaux, the French Minister of Finance. Private Block consented to let him pass.

You know the old story—once a faithful sentinel stopped Napoleon, and the Emperor, pleased with the dutiful man, made him a Captain; but Private Block's promotion has not yet been announced.

An Exchange of Friendly Greetings

In the basement are a restaurant and a café of the New York type, uninteresting for the moment; you make your way up a short pair of stairs into the huge domed hall; you are just in time, for Commissioner Peck is making a speech. He says that the Exposition is a fête of peace and that it will strengthen the fraternity of nations. As Mr. Peck speaks in English you understand every word he says, but probably M. Picard, to whom he is speaking, does not. However, he winds up his speech in French, saying: "Vive le commissaire général Picard! Vive l'Exposition universelle de 1900! Vive la France!"

And that we all understood. Then M. Picard, who had been given a gold key, with a medallion of the building in relief, retorted in his own language. He said the Exposition was a fête of concord and would bind the nations closer in brotherhood. In conclusion he cried: "Vivent les États Unis! Vive Monsieur MacKinley! Vive Monsieur Peck!"

The ceremony was over; the sandwiches were eaten; we went away.

Our Model Post-Office in Paris

Architecturally the United States building is rather disappointing. It is high-shouldered and narrow, and the huge dome that tops it gives it somewhat the air of a small boy with his grandfather's hat on. Inside, however, it is admirable. It has the comfort of a well-appointed club. There are writing-rooms, smoking-rooms, parlors—in a word, everything that will serve to make the pavilion a home for the Americans exiled in Paris. There is even that last fine flower of civilization, an American bootblack. Only three of the States have private reception-rooms—Massachusetts, California and New York; they are in the second gallery.

The pavilion is, as I have intimated, just what it should be, a fragment of home set down here on the left bank of the Seine. It is a general rendezvous where every one may meet every one else. After you have had your boots blacked by the white-toothed darky in the basement, you may stroll up to your own pet clubroom and write letters, and then post them in a bona fide United States post-office. This is something new in its way. Indeed, Postmaster-General Smith has set the official world agog. If M. Mougeot, his French confrère, is right, no Government ever before established a branch post-office in a foreign country. This office is in charge of Mr. L. P. Moore, of Washington, who brought with him a detail of seven men and all the newest things in postal equipment. The office is run exactly as the post-office in your own city. You may register letters, dispatch money-orders or transmit any other postal business. More important still, you may receive your letters there. Any one who has traveled much knows how ill-equipped the banks and agencies are for classing and forwarding letters, especially in years of crowded travel; but in that Uncle Sam is expert. So if you have a friend in Paris whom you want to reach, or if you want to give an address to those you leave behind you, you can't do better than:

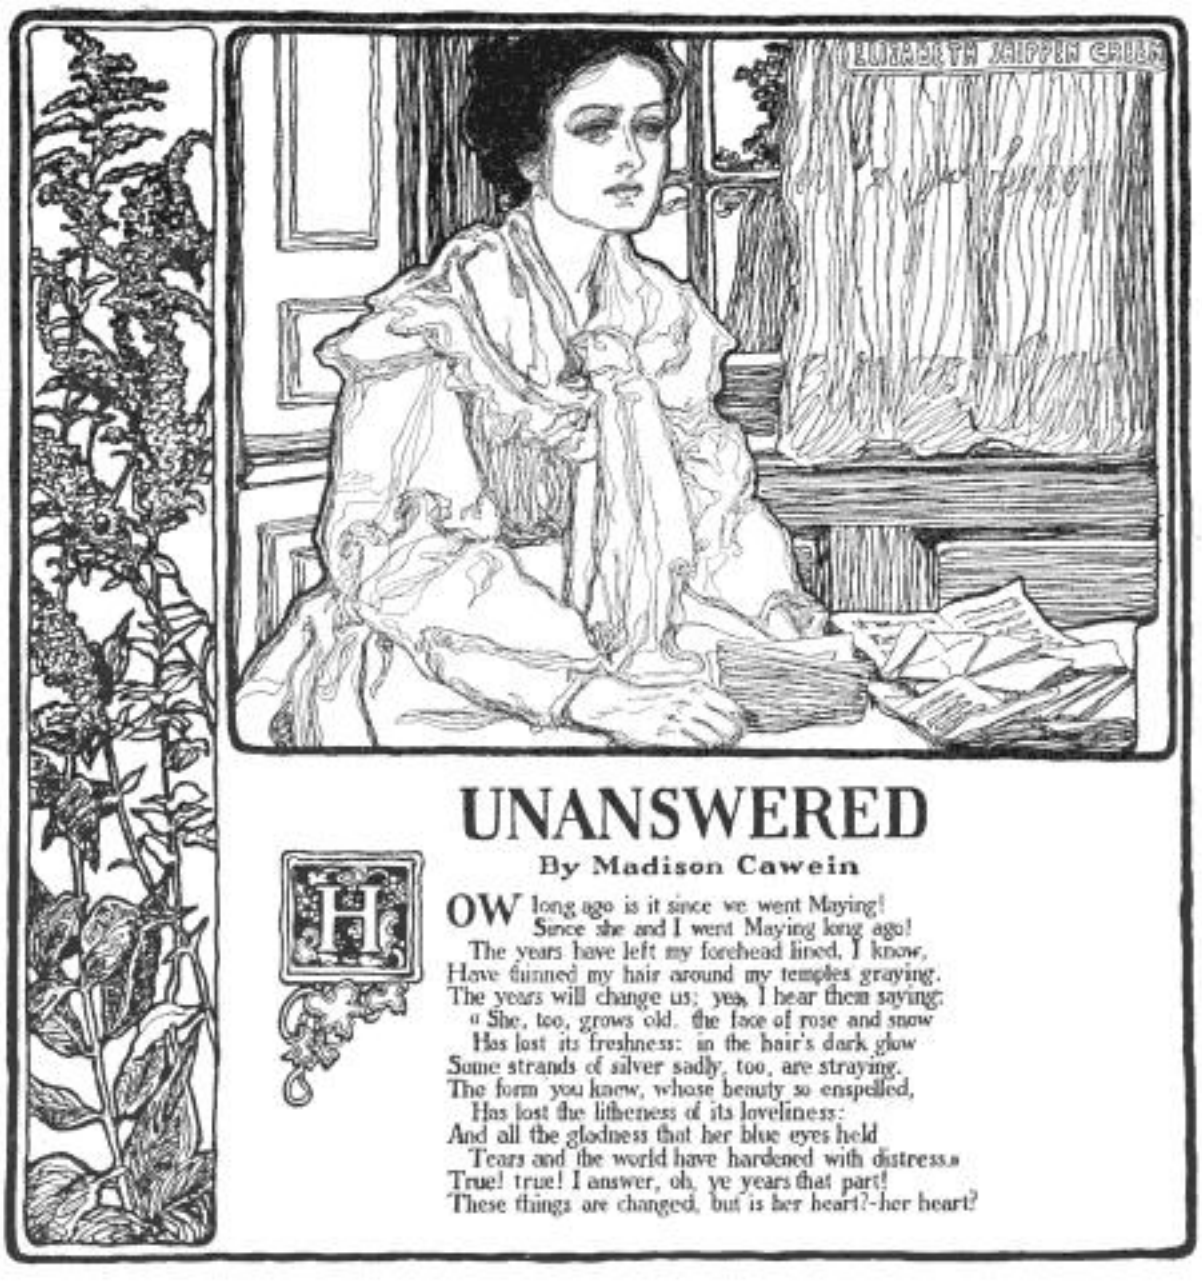
JOHN SO AND SO, Esq.
Post-Office
United States Pavilion
Paris, France

Mr. Moore brought with him four canceling machines, one of them capable of canceling 60,000 stamps an hour, and the others nearly as many. The French postal officials have buzzed like flies about these machines, for in France stamps are still canceled by hand. If you look in any post-office window you will see a little bearded man, smoking a cigarette, and working leisurely away with a rubber hand-stamp. The good example set by these Yankee machines will change all that within a year.

Mr. Sousa's Story of His Father

Sousa's band is here breeding homesickness in the colony and fascinating the Parisians. There is nothing quite so good in Paris; indeed, there is nothing quite so good anywhere. And the march king's music has got into the heads and hearts of the people—Gavroche and his fellow-gamins march the streets whistling El Capitan.

I had seen Mr. Sousa on his pedestal—dressed in gold-braided uniform and waving a baton—any number of times, but he is quite as interesting, I assure you, when he lounges in an easy chair behind a good cigar. There were thirty or forty exiles gathered in Henry Mayer's studio. Mr. Sousa and I smoked in a corner. Mr. Sousa comes naturally by his liking for cozy corners.



"My dear old father was a music teacher," Mr. Sousa explains. "I really believe he was about the worst musician I ever knew, and I've known a great many. And then he had a remarkably firm objection to work. Father used to come down to breakfast about midday. After the meal he would light a cigar and lie down in an easy chair.

"'Tony, Tony!' mother would say, 'don't you know you have three lessons to give to-day?'

"Father would get up, stretch himself—he was a big man—and go over and kiss mother.

"'Tut, tut, dear,' he would say, 'the day was made for rest and the night for sleep'—and he would go upstairs to bed again."

UNANSWERED

By Madison Cawein

HOW long ago is it since we went Maying!
Since she and I went Maying long ago!
The years have left my forehead lined, I know,
Have tinned my hair around my temples graying.
The years will change us: yes, I hear them saying:
"She, too, grows old. the face of rose and snow
Has lost its freshness: in the hair's dark glow
Some strands of silver sadly, too, are straying.
The form you know, whose beauty so enspelled,
Has lost the litheness of its loveliness:
And all the gladness that her blue eyes held
Tears and the world have hardened with distress."
True! true! I answer, oh, ye years that part!
These things are changed, but is her heart?-her heart?

Great George's Work

By John Habberton

MIDDLEWAY was one of the best-protected towns within the Union lines down South in the spring of 1865. The two infantry regiments, the cavalry battalion and the single light battery which collectively formed the garrison of the post were encamped at the right, left and rear of the town limits. All scouting parties, as well as the daily details of pickets and videttes, went to the front by roads which did not pass through the town, and, to prevent any cause of complaint by the natives against the troops, there was quartered within the town itself a provost guard of twenty men that kept soldiers from entering. The defensive lines of the post, determined by the lay of the land, were at the rear of the town, and occasionally the outposts were forced back to them, but both armies avoided fighting in the streets, for Middleway contained some historic buildings of the Revolutionary period, as well as a Masonic lodge-room in which Washington himself had occasionally appeared.

The precautions were greatly to the liking of the men of the town, all of whom were too old to be in the Southern army, but to two large and well-meaning though restless classes the careful seclusion of the place was unspeakably obnoxious. One of these classes contained many of the young women of Middleway; in the other were all the young men of the two infantry regiments, the cavalry battalion and the battery; in other words, about three-fourths of the entire garrison of the post. The young women hated the Yankee uniform and all that it typified, but they did sometimes long for society that did not consist wholly of a single sex. Occasionally a brother or sweetheart or cousin got out of the Confederate lines and into the town under cover of darkness, and great was some young woman's joy for a day or two, but the provost guard had acquired so many spies among the colored people that such visits became risky and infrequent.

Surely, reasoned some of the young women, it would not be disloyal or otherwise dreadful for a family or a few girls to sometimes entertain a few of the invaders who were gentlemen, if such there were. Besides, if the Yankees were not impervious to reason, it might not be impossible to convince some of them of the political error of their ways—if there could but be an opportunity of talking to the creatures!

True, there was the provost guard, but that organization, for some stupid reason that the young women could not imagine, was composed of staid, middle-aged men, who seemed content, in their leisure hours, to smoke, play chess, and exchange Revolutionary stories with the young women's grandfathers.

The feeling of the young men of the garrison was expressed more strongly and with great indignation. Such of the soldiers as had been reputable members of Northern society declared it an outrage that they should be kept out of the town because some men of the baser sort might plunder chicken-coops and steal exposed teaspoons. It was brutalizing for a lot of men to be herded together like so many animals, and deprived of a word with the other sex, when the means of alleviation were so near at hand. Some of them went so far as to join in a request for permission to attend Sunday services in the old church of the town, promising to go and return in a body, but their request was returned with the sad disapproval of the post commander.

"There's more than one way of doing a thing," said little Corporal Surtiss to the three men who shared with him an eight-by-ten log hut in one of the infantry camps. Surtiss had come from the West and brought with him a conviction that any man was equal to almost anything which he really wished to do; he had also earned, in the regiment, a reputation for able individual scouting and for thinking much on any subject before he talked of it. "All of us have sometimes dodged the camp-guards by daylight when we wanted to go outside for berries or nuts, or to go fishing, so why can't we do the same on a dark night, and get into the town?"

"We know where the weak spots of the camp line are," said Private Tattam, "but how about dodging the provost fiends—in the dark, too—when we reach the town?"

"It seems to me," yawned Private Roosley, who aspired to a commission and was studying not only tactics but strategy, "that before devising ways of entering the town 'twould be well to determine what we are to do when fairly in. None of us knows one house or family from another."

"Now, listen!" said Surtiss. "I confess that I've been engineering this job for some time. In fact, I've already scraped acquaintance, in a roundabout way, with some people whom I'm sure we shall like."

"Great Scott!" exclaimed Walterson with a look that was almost reverential. "How did you manage it?"

"Through a darky—one of the women who have permits to visit camp to sell pies and cakes and things. Every colored person adores some white person of the same sex—'tis a well-known trait of the darkies."

"That's true. Go on."

"I asked one of the colored women, some time ago, if there weren't any real nice, clever Middleway girls who liked to read; I said I had several capital books, recently sent me by my mother and sisters, that I had read and would be glad to lend to any of the young people who would appreciate them. 'I'll t'ink up somebody; I will, fo' sho,' Massa,' the woman replied. She was better than her word, for in a day or two she gave me names and descriptions of four young women whom she'd approached on the subject, and who said they were simply dying for something new to read, and that there must be something good about some Yankees, after all. I sent back four books in the woman's basket. The girls were very curious as to the sort of man that sent them, so I——"

"So you sent a photograph of yourself?"

"I beg your pardon," said Surtiss with much dignity for so short a man. "I sent photographs of my sisters, as a hint that I was accustomed to the society of ladies. But I also sent one of those tintypes for which we four chaps sat together."

"Hurrah!" shouted Walterson. "Which of our several and special types of beauty impressed the ladies most favorably?"

"Well, they sent word that they wished all four of us might be put on the provost guard, so that they might hope for a call."

"No chance for youngsters like us to get into the provost guard," groaned Tattam.

"I sent back four books in the woman's basket"

"Not a chance," assented Surtiss. "Still, I've kept the acquaintance alive, after a fashion, by sending more reading matter, and even some good coffee, which is scarcer in the South than Union sentiment, and the upshot is that they and their parents will be glad to see us, at our convenience, and to keep the affair absolutely secret. The colored woman's husband will guide us safely past the provost fiends and to one of the houses, provided we give him timely notice and make our way to a certain tree on the outskirts of the town. I've already taken the bearings of that tree carefully and am sure I can make it in the dark, so the only questions that remain are, Who will go? and, When shall we go?"

"It must be a quick run," suggested Roosley. "We shall have to do it between retreat roll-call, at sunset, and tattoo roll-call, at 8:45—awfully countrified hours for making calls."

"Yet," said Walterson, "we must go late enough to avoid finding them at supper, so we sha'n't have more than an hour indoors."

"That's quite long enough for a first call on ladies with whom we're not yet acquainted," said Tattam. "Eh, Surtiss?"

"Quite so. Now, gentlemen, say when!"

"Let's try it day after to-morrow," said Roosley. "'Twill be the Fourth of July, and every good Virginian will be reminiscent of the great George. That will give us plenty to talk about. Besides, the camp will be lively, so we shan't be missed. As to running the guard—let's hope the night will be cloudy, for the moon will be pretty large."

For two days there was continuous inspection and repair of four limited wardrobes; handkerchiefs and white cotton gloves were washed, best shoes were polished and re-polished, white collars, purchased from the officers' goods at the sutler's shop, were carefully adjusted to military shirts, and the ladies were informed of the intended call. Soon after dusk on the appointed night, which fortunately was cloudy and dark, four men flattened themselves against the rear of an officer's hut which was near the most practicable portion of the guard-line, and awaited the second when the sentry was almost at the end of his beat; then all tiptoed swiftly through the gloom and out of eye-shot, and, led by Surtiss, hurried toward the big tree. The colored man, who was soon found, guided them across a fence, through an orchard, across another fence and through still another orchard into a long grape arbor, where he whispered:

"Dis yere's de house—ol' Jedge Prewen's house."

"There are no lights in it!" whispered Roosley suspiciously.

"Yes, dey is, Massa," replied the colored man, "but you cayn't see 'em. De winders hez got thick shutters, f'om way back in ol' times."

According to previous agreement, the four visitors stopped an instant and donned their white gloves. The colored man tapped gently at a side door under a porch. The door opened, and the four men found themselves in a large room, lighted by several candles, and in the presence of an old gentleman who looked quickly and sharply at all of them.

"Judge Prewen, I suppose?" said Surtiss.

"At your service, sir," the Judge replied, as he extended his hand.

"Thank you. My name is Surtiss. Allow me to introduce my friends—Mr. Roosley—Mr. Tattam—Mr. Walterson. We've been encouraged to believe that a call from us would not be unwelcome, and we knew of no day on which people of both sections could meet more amicably."

"Your sentiment does you honor, sir, and it honors us also. Please be seated, gentlemen."

The Judge left the room and returned in a moment or two with his wife, a slight, gentle old lady with a face that at once made all the visitors think of home. A moment later all arose again as the Judge said:

"Gentlemen, my daughters—Martha and Anna."

The visitors saw two plainly dressed but handsome young women, the older of whom was very dignified and had large, dark, searching eyes, the younger with a dimpled face and laughing eyes. Soon two other young women entered, and the men were presented to Miss Long and Miss Shenway—pretty girls both—and within five minutes the virtues of the immortal Washington were being praised as volubly and enthusiastically as if all present had been lifelong acquaintances. Suddenly one of the daughters whispered to the Judge, who arose and said:

"Kindly take supper with us, gentlemen."

"We had carefully planned to spare you that infliction," said Corporal Surtiss, as, by virtue of his rank, he offered his arm to the hostess.

"And we," said Miss Anna with a laugh, "planned carefully that you shouldn't miss it. We don't believe you Yankees ever tasted plum-leaf tea, or sweet-potato coffee."

On entering the dining-room the visitors vowed, each to himself, that he would cheerfully drink any decoction at such a feast, for the table was bountifully spread. There was fried chicken, and chicken salad, and ham omelette, and corn fritters, and broiled sweet potato, and two or three dishes unrecognizable by Northern eyes, besides several kinds of bread, hot and cold; and there was also a decanter from which the Judge soon filled wine-glasses which the ladies passed to the visitors while the Judge arose and said:

"Our only possible substitute for wine, gentlemen—some Virginia apple-brandy half as old as I. To the memory of Washington—the greatest Virginian and American!"

Surtiss responded by quoting from the song Red, White and Blue the lines,

"May the memory of Washington ne'er wither,
Nor the star of his glory grow dim,"

and the supper began anew. Dainty hands pressed dish after dish upon the guests, and soon the conversation drifted far away from Washington. Surtiss told Mrs. Prewen of his mother and sisters, and he talked literature, especially poetry, to the elder Miss Prewen, whose large, dark eyes assisted her tongue so much at replying and questioning that Surtiss thought her the most sympathetic conversationalist he had ever met. Walterson exchanged horseback-riding reminiscences with Miss Anna, Tattam and Miss Long compared the winter festivities of North and South, Roosley talked music with Miss Shenway and world-politics with the Judge, and all the young people were looking as if everything that was being said was delightful, and the Judge and his wife seemed to have grown several years younger within a few minutes, when suddenly, through a door near the foot of the table, which screened every one but the hostess, dashed two young men with long hair and gray clothes of military cut, and precipitated themselves upon Mrs. Prewen.

"Harry! Wayne!" exclaimed Miss Anna, hurrying toward them, while her sister, who had abated her dignity and become quite rosy while chatting with Surtiss, suddenly looked ashen and apprehensive, and her eyes seemed to die as they turned inquiringly toward Surtiss.

"How can you?" whispered the Corporal reproachfully. "We are soldiers, so we know our kind when we see them, but personally we are gentlemen—and your guests."

Meanwhile the intruders had turned and seen for the first time that there were blue uniforms at the table; then they looked as furtive and defiant as trapped animals.

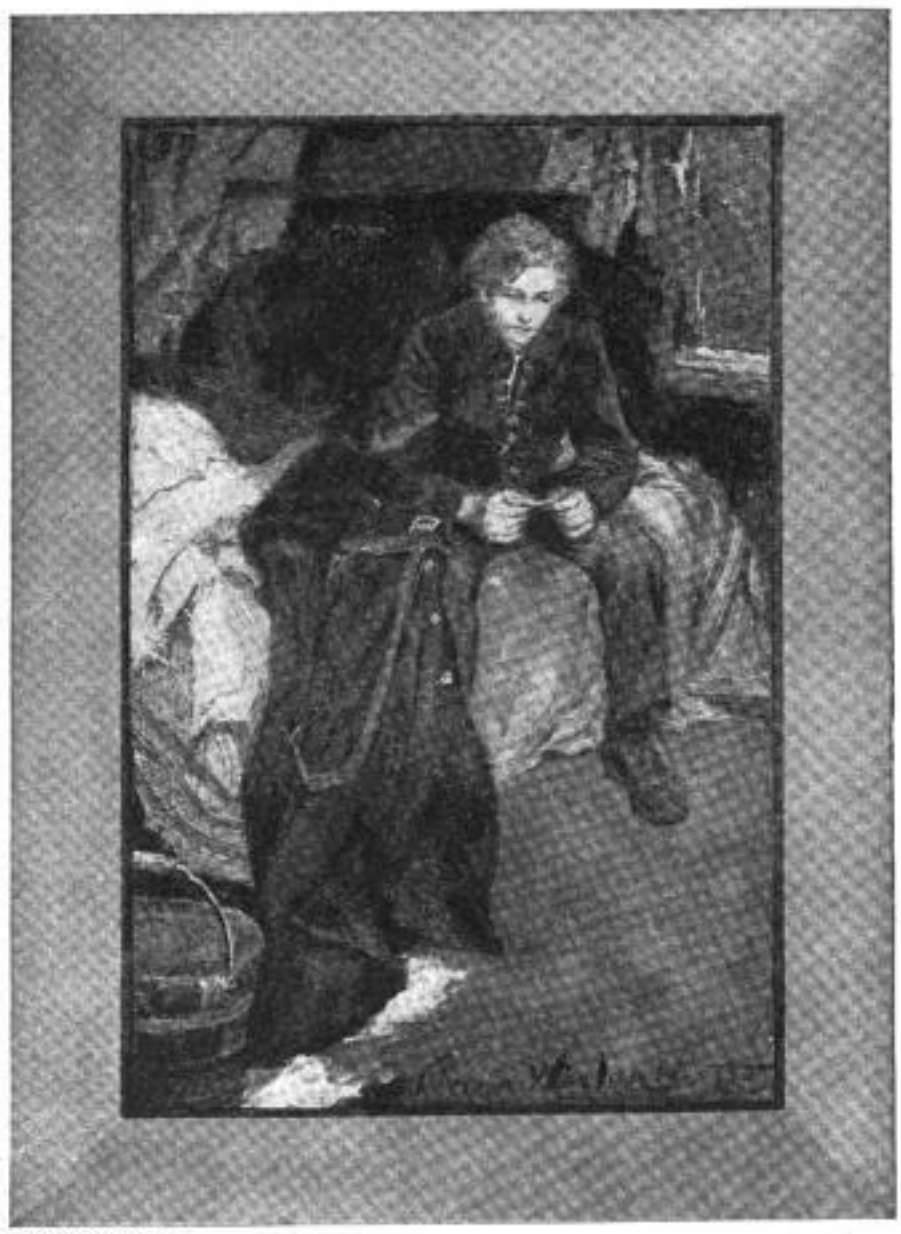
"My sons," said the Judge, his voice betraying much agitation as he looked appealingly toward his guests, "these are Northern gentlemen to whom we are indebted for some highly valued courtesies."

"And from whom you've nothing to fear," added the elder Miss Prewen.

"In proof of which," said Surtiss, rising, "let's shake hands, gentlemen—a soldier-shake——" A ceremony in which his comrades made haste to participate, while Miss Anna set two more chairs, and one of the men in gray said to the Northern men as he touched his collar, on which was the insignia of a captain:

"On my honor as an officer and gentleman I assure you that we are within your lines for no purpose but to visit our family, and to——"

He paused; Miss Long and Miss Shenway blushed, and the younger man in gray added:



"And to see our sweethearts. There, Harry, we've made a clean breast of it. We've had to dodge our own guards and pickets as well as yours, for though we had verbal permission from our regimental commander we had no passes."

"Good!" exclaimed Roosley. "I'd cheerfully have taken similar risks, if my own dear ones were within fifty miles of our lines."

Again the supper-table engaged attention, and soon the young women were gazing in amused wonder at the spectacle of Northern and Southern soldiers chatting together as amicably as if they had not been trained to take one another's lives at any convenient opportunity. The Judge was so affected that he again filled glasses and toasted the memory of Washington. Surtiss, who under delightful tuition had begun to discover new capabilities in his own eyes, persuaded the elder Miss Prewen to add grace to the dignity of the toast by touching her lips to the edge of his glass, and had picked up a handkerchief which Miss Prewen dropped, when all were startled by three cannon-shots fired in quick succession.

"The general alarm!" exclaimed Surtiss, as he and his comrades sprang to their feet. For a few seconds there was silence and a general sense of constraint; then the cavalry bugle-call "Boots and Saddles" and the "long roll" of the infantry drums were heard.

"Ladies and gentlemen," said Surtiss, "kindly pardon a hasty leave-taking. Duty is duty."

Where he soon would BITE

Within it he found another bit of paper

Persistent rapping was heard at the side door. The Judge answered it, and every one in the dining-room heard a negro's voice exclaiming:

"Fo' de Lo'd, Jedge, dem provoses is comin' to yo' house mighty soon. Dey's ben askin' some colo'd folks ef yo' boys ain' done come home."

"They've caught so many of our men!" groaned the Judge. "They know the inside of every house in the town. 'Tis their duty, I know, but—'tis awful. My sons, I don't know where you can hide and be safe."

"I do!" said Surtiss. "Come with us!"

"But how——" began the older man in gray.

"I'll tell you as we go along. There's no time to waste; we'll be missed. Judge, I suggest that you have your table cleared quickly, so as to destroy traces of visitors. If you're asked about your sons, say they've been here, but have gone, you don't know where, which will be entirely true. Ladies, I most sincerely hope that at some future time we may have——"

The elder Miss Prewen stopped him, led him aside, looked searchingly into his eyes and said:

"My brothers——"

"I've given my word, Miss Prewen, and 'tis the word of a gentleman."

"Yes, but 'tis also the word of an enemy. Even gentlemen sometimes do cruel things in war."

Surtiss took her hand and whispered:

"Look into my soul—you can do it—and you will find the truth. If you don't, then accept the word of a—of your most earnest worshiper."

The six men hurried off together and Captain Prewen whispered to Surtiss:

"We are in your hands. What are you going to do with us?"

"Take you into our camp."

The Captain stopped and exclaimed:

"So that's what the word of a gentleman—and a Yankee—amounts to!"

"Come along! Don't lose your manners—don't lose your head, either. As you're an officer you ought to know that our entire picket reserve is on the line by this time, each man with a hundred eyes in his head, and the town itself is likely to be overrun by our men in a few minutes. Our camp is the only safe place for you until the alarm is over. We'll put you under the bottom bunk of our hut until the alarm is over; there's a newspaper flap inside the window and we padlock the door when we're all out—as we shall be as soon as we get our things. There's grub and water enough to keep you alive and blankets enough to keep you warm. Understand?"

"Yes, and I apologize for suspecting you. But your guards will detect us as we go in."

"How so? There are no lights in camp, and all clothes look alike in the dark. Some sentry may fire, but we, too, must take that risk, for all of us will have to run the guard. But shots in the dark aren't likely to hit. When the row is over we'll get you out—probably tomorrow night—in the same way. Softly now, boys; we're nearing the line. I'll keep a little in advance; when I dash, all follow at the run—and on tiptoe, mind!"

The guard-line was successfully "run" and the camp was quiet; evidently the regiment had already gone out. The hut was reached and opened, and six men huddled in; some one dropped the bar of the door, Surtiss lighted a candle and said, as the two men in gray looked quickly about the hut and the other men snatched their rifles and belts:

"Make yourselves at home, gentlemen. You'll find bread and cold meat in a box on the wall, and water in a big wooden pail. Here's tobacco, if you chew—'twon't be safe to smoke. Drape the front of the lower bunk with a blanket—there are enough others to soften the boards. Stir the coals of the fireplace, if you need light; the candle won't be safe, so out it goes."

Suiting the action to the word, he hurried out with his comrades, one of whom padlocked the door, and while the men in gray hid themselves and wondered what would happen if the four should not return, Surtiss and his hut-mates, fully armed and equipped, were at the guard-house and asking which route the regiment had taken.

The alarm proved to be very like some which had preceded it; the men in the ranks wondered whether some professional thief had sneaked toward a cavalry vidette with the hope of capturing a horse and carbine to be sold to the enemy, or whether the enemy, in memory of the day, had done some patriotic but purposeless worrying of the outposts, or whether—quite probably, too—the post commander had planned a false alarm to accustom his men to quick response to sudden calls. All the troops lost a night of sleep, returned to their camps between dawn and sunrise, demanded double allowance of coffee, and gave the remainder of the morning to slumber. When Surtiss and his chums returned, the Corporal threw himself into the lower bunk, hung his head over the side and whispered:

"How are our friends, the enemy?"

"Comfortable, thank you," replied a hoarse whisper. "Any of you hit?"

"Not a scratch. Think you could get outside of some hot coffee?"

A blissful groan and a blissful sigh came together from beneath the bunk, and Surtiss said:

"Glad you kept the fire alive. Lie low till we get back from the cookhouse; then you can crawl out and take breakfast with us."

A few moments later three men sat on the side of the bunk and one on a box and one on a block of wood, while the sixth, at the fire, was frying pork and potatoes, and the man on the box toasted some bread, and the room was further perfumed from the tin pail, on the coals, in which the rations of coffee had been brought from the cookhouse. When all was ready the younger man in gray whispered:

"I wish father was here, to ask a blessing on this meal."

"And I," said Surtiss, "wish your sister could peep in and see how safe you are. She—one of your sisters—seemed to doubt my word last night."

"She sha'n't do so again, if we get out of here alive," said the Captain.

"You'll risk going home again, after knowing that the provost guard were looking for you?"

"We'll risk seeing our sweethearts," said the younger man, "and there are trusty messengers."

"Won't you see, also, that I get early word of your safety? Ask the ladies to let me know," said the Corporal.

"Indeed we shall."

After breakfast the atmosphere of the room was clouded by smoke from six pipes, and the owners of the hut dropped into their bunks, first offering the men in gray a pack of cards, and warning them to return to their hiding-place should any alarm or demand be heard, and not to fail to wake the sleepers in time for dinner-call, which would sound at twelve sharp by the watch which Surtiss hung over the fireplace. After dinner there was another smoky period, enlivened by so much conversation, in whispers, that the half-light admitted by the paper window-shade disappeared almost before the party knew it was going.

"I wish, gentlemen," said Surtiss, "that the cook would serve something to-night that would vary our bill-of-fare. He may give us dried-apple sauce, or rice and molasses, but I can't recommend either—especially after what was set before us last night."

"Does he——" began the younger man in gray, after which he laughed and continued, "I suppose he doesn't give you coffee twice in one day?"

"Indeed he does. Besides, as I never drink any, but draw my coffee ration dry, and in bulk, we've a private stock to draw upon."

"Coffee twice a day!" exclaimed the Captain, "and a soldier who never drinks it! Wayne, do you suppose they'll believe us if we tell that in our own camp—if we ever reach it?"

"Keep your hearts out of your mouths for about an hour," said Surtiss, "and you shall be fairly started. Every one will be in the huts, eating supper or smoking; there are no lights outdoors except at the cookhouse fires, and they won't be blazing."

"But our uniforms! Any man within several paces can see that they're not blue."

"Yes, I'd thought of that, so each of you will wear, while crossing the camp, one of our overcoats, with collar turned up to hide your long hair, and you'll wear our caps, keeping your hats hidden under the coats. I'll steer you to a good place to cross the guard-line, and give you the signal for starting; then I'll bring back our overcoats and caps and you'll take your chances. You'll be in no great danger till you reach the town. If you escape from that also, send us word; we chance to know that letters frequently reach the town from your lines."

"Indeed? Well, men can't be expected to forget their families, nor shall we forget our friends."

An hour later the two men in gray had safely crossed the guard-line and the four men in blue were recalling the details of the previous evening's adventure, and Surtiss was occasionally slipping his hand into his breast-pocket and then placing it on his face, as he had done many times while standing at arms through the previous night.

"My recollections of that delightful evening—so cruelly interrupted, too," sighed Roosley, "are so vivid that I really inhale again a whiff of cologne, or some delightful perfume which was perceptible in the dining-room last evening. Blessed be fragrant memories!"

Surtiss' hand remained at rest during the remainder of the evening. Next morning he looked like a man who had done extra guard duty over night; he went on the sick list, carrying to the surgeon so many complaints that he was excused from all duty for the day. Unlike other very sick men, however, he did not remain within doors, though the weather was quite inclement. He lounged at the line, near the guard-house, beyond which the colored peddlers were not allowed to pass; he also looked into several baskets but saw nothing to his liking, for how could he endure cold fried fish, or underdone pie or cake, within forty-eight hours of the feast at Judge Prewen's?

One colored woman, however, who stood a little apart from the others, showed him a cake taken from the bottom of her basket, and said softly:

"Dis one was done baked 'spressly fo' you, Massa, an' dey said 'twas de kin' dat mus'n't be cut, but jes' broke, mighty sof' an' keerful, when dere's nobody roun' to grab a piece of it."

Surtiss took the cake, hid it in the breast of his overcoat, went to his hut and said:

"Drill-call will blow in a few minutes. Don't you chaps want to get your traps and go out, so a sick man can drop asleep at once?"

"We'll do anything to be obliging," replied Roosley, "but—sick? I was about to ask what medicine the doctor gave you, that you were pulled together so soon. I never saw you looking better."

"Humph! Fever coming back, I suppose. Get out—all of you!"

The instant he was alone Surtiss dropped the window flap, barred the door, and carefully broke the cake. In the centre was some paper which he unfolded carefully, and within it he found another bit of paper on which was penciled:

> "Heaven bless and preserve you forever! They reached us safely and have gone. A thousand apologies for having doubted you an instant. "M."

Surtiss raised the note to his lips and held it there. He re-read the note, and re-re-read it; then he placed it inside the little handkerchief, which also he pressed to his lips before he replaced it in his breast. He paced the small floor, only three steps long, imagined the war over, the South pacified, and a wedding—his own—in the old Middleway church, of which he had seen only the spire. When drill ended his comrades found him lying in a bunk, from which he drawled:

"Our friends, the enemy, are all right."

"Hurrah!" shouted Walterson. "How did you hear?"

"Through one of the darky peddlers."

"But," said Roosley, "we thought you'd been asleep?"

"You've dreamed it!" said Tattam. "Your eyes are blazing bright! Your fever's getting worse!"

For several successive days, barring one spent on picket duty, Surtiss haunted the peddler's line, and finally received another cake, with special injunctions. Again he found a note, which read as follows:

> "We have heard from them. Come again soon and read their letter, and finish that supper, and do come alone.
> "MARTHA'S SISTER."

Surtiss did some thinking, after which he said to his comrades:

"Don't you think it about time for us to know whether those two Rebs reached their own lines? I've a great mind to run the guard to-night, and ask."

"'Twould be very risky," said Roosley. "The sky is clear to-day, and there'll be bright moonlight by tattoo roll-call. Still, if your heart is set on going, we'll keep our hearts in our mouths till you return; that'll be a fair division of labor. If you're late, I'll answer for you at roll-call; I can imitate your voice, and with Roosley and Tattam at either side of me and all three of us in the rear rank, nobody'll be the wiser."

Surtiss started, and he also carried a heart in his mouth. He did much sneaking and hiding, but he had not done occasional scouting outside the lines for nothing. As he entered the Prewen's garden and hurried toward the friendly grape-arbor he stopped to recall, if he could, the manner in which his guide in the previous visit had knocked at the door. As he paused he heard a window-sash rise; looking upward he saw, dim though the starlight was, a face which he was sure was that of Martha Prewen; then he saw a beckoning hand. The face disappeared, the window closed, and in a moment Surtiss was at the side door, which opened into darkness, but a small, warm hand found his and guided him, while its owner said:

"I felt sure you were coming to-night, and I was looking in the direction from——"

"Bless you!" whispered Surtiss, extending his arms in the dark and finding something that did not resist them, nor repel his lips. In a moment the girl said:

"Supper is waiting, and my sister and parents are dying to thank you."

Together they entered the dining-room. Miss Anna looked at them a second inquiringly; then her eyes danced and she clapped her hands, and her sister blushed brilliantly, and Surtiss felt himself a young god, and the old people thanked him for his daring kindness to their sons.

"My comrades did as much as I," protested Surtiss.

"After you had planned everything," said the elder Miss Prewen, who said much more with her eyes. "'Twas you who promised my brothers——"

"And promised you also," interrupted Surtiss with a flash from his own eyes, under which Miss Prewen blushed again.

"Show him Harry's letter, father," said Miss Anna, while her sister and mother pressed various dishes upon Surtiss.

"It seems," said the Judge, "that the alarm, when you and my boys were here, was caused by a demonstration for the purpose of driving the provost guard from the town for two or three hours, so that a few Freemasons in our army might visit the lodge in which Washington himself had been. I say this to you in confidence, for your own information only, but I am credibly assured that your General is already informed of it."

The Judge took a letter from his pocket; Miss Anna passed it across the table toward Surtiss, but her sister quickly snatched it and insisted on reading it aloud. It was full of praise of the kindness of the four soldiers to their brothers-in-arms and of Surtiss' fund of resource, all of which the Corporal modestly insisted was overrated.

"But, sister, you've not read all of it," said Miss Anna.

"Daughter!" said the Judge severely.

"Anna!" exclaimed the mother reproachfully, while again the elder Miss Prewen blushed.

After supper Miss Anna assisted her mother to clear the table, explaining to the guest that though the war had robbed them of their slaves it had given them the best servants in the world. She also begged her father to discover the reason that one of the kitchen windows admitted far too much cold air between sashes and frame, so Surtiss, finding himself alone in the sitting-room with the only woman in the world, made haste to say much to which the only woman listened without protest.

Suddenly Miss Anna entered the room, unheard by either of the occupants, and saw a blue-clad arm about her sister. She hurried in front of the couple, looked roguishly into Surtiss' face, and said:

"Was it very dreadful for me to write you that note?"

"Positively shocking! Consider yourself condemned, for life, to be my sister-in-law."

"I felt sure——" began Miss Anna, turning her eyes upon her sister, who, withdrawing herself from the encircling arm, became her most dignified self and said to Surtiss:

"I knew nothing whatever of that note until it had been sent!"

"Ah, well," said Surtiss, as he replaced his arm, "in consideration of the result, I forgive you;" and he looked so mischievous and the girl looked so helpless to reply to so illogical a statement, that Miss Anna hurried from the room to laugh to her heart's content.

"Now tell me," asked Surtiss, "like the all-satisfying angel you are, what part of your brother's letter was it that you did not read to me?"

Then was Miss Prewen's opportunity to look mischievous, which she did most effectively.

"He wrote that you were so fine a fellow that he wished some Virginia girl might bewitch you and capture you, but he feared you already had a sweetheart, for he saw you slyly place a handkerchief to your lips. He was sure 'twas not your own, for 'twas very small, and perfumed."

"I plead guilty—and I'm proud of it," said Surtiss, taking the precious bit of linen from his breast-pocket, "and I boldly repeat the act"—which he proceeded to do—"but I assure you that I'd no intention of stealing the handkerchief. You'll remember that I picked it up just as the alarm-guns fired; naturally I clenched my hands, and in the hurry of——"

"But the idea of kissing such a thing!" the girl murmured. Her remark was not intended as a hint, but Surtiss construed it as one, and when Miss Prewen protested that 'twas dreadful, because their acquaintance was very, very short, Surtiss insisted that they would continue to know each other better and better to the end of eternity, because he could not think for a moment of living without her companionship.

"But," said the girl, "I'm a Southerner, and can never be otherwise. You are a Yankee, so you can't be a Virginian."

"Can't I? Please know that besides being a Yankee I am an American, so I can become anything else that's American and reputable. When the war ends, as it soon must, I shall become a Virginian in haste, unless you should be so heartless and cruel as to discourage me."

Before many weeks the war did end and, as Miss Prewen did not discourage him, Surtiss became a Virginian by adoption and marriage. There was much comment in Middleway on a Virginia girl's willingness to wed one of her native State's invaders, but when Captain Prewen and his brother told the story of their rescue by the prospective bridegroom all opposition ceased, and Surtiss' popularity among the natives became so great that Walterson manifested some jealousy of his comrade, for had not he, too, done all in his power for the Prewen brothers? He appealed to Miss Anna to support his claim, and as he and she had been exchanging notes and messages within a few weeks, Miss Anna came bravely to his assistance; so one evening there was a quadruple wedding in the old church—an affair that was the talk of the country for months, and whenever people spoke of it to the Judge the old man replied: "'Twas all great George's work! So, as my sons-in-law frequently sing:

> "'May the memory of Washington ne'er wither,
> Nor the star of his glory grow dim.'"

A SOLDIER OF PURPOSE

By Major J. A. Watrous, U. S. A.

"POOR Colonel Miley! He was material for a Major-General."

Such was the comment of Lieutenant Bissell Thomas, a schoolmate of Miley's at Belleville, Illinois, where both were boys, when he heard of Colonel John D. Miley's death at Manila.

John Miley was the eldest of the four sons of George Miley, a Civil War veteran, who lived on a ten-acre patch of ground near Belleville. The senior Miley was not able to do much in caring for his family, so it happened that when Colonel Miley was a lad of ten years he was obliged to take upon himself leadership, not only in supporting himself, but in caring for the whole family. The ten acres were converted into a truck garden, and pasture for the two cows was rented of a neighbor. The truck garden was tilled by the future Colonel, and it was he who milked and drove the cows to and from the pasture and cared for the horse that hauled the truck wagon. Summer mornings he was up at half-past three to gather the vegetables, and long before others had breakfasted he drove to market with the butter his mother had made. Going and coming from market the boy held the lines in one hand and an open book in the other. In this way, and in the time he could spare from sleep and rest after the long days of hard work, John Miley acquired most of the education he possessed before going to West Point.

Young Miley's Busy Fourth

There were no holidays for him when a boy. Marketing had to be done on the Fourth of July, and on Memorial days the garden needed his attention. One Fourth of July some neighbor boys railed at him for working that day, declaring that nothing could induce them to slave away, as he was doing, on such a holiday.

"You are mistaken, boys," said John, as he straightened up. "If your celebration of the Fourth meant double work for your partner, and your partner was your mother, you would stick to your work, as I am doing."

"Come on, boys, John is right; he is always right," said the leader, as the band went their way, leaving John bending over his onion bed.

As soon as the younger brothers were old enough they helped John and his partner, and the world grew brighter for the struggling family, and then the boy, who had two well-defined ambitions—one to help his mother and the other to go to West Point, as another Belleville boy had done—as Merritt had done—had more time in which to prepare himself for the rugged journey between then and a successful examination for appointment as a cadet. Not a moment of time was lost. In point of fact, young Miley began preparations for the examination when he assumed leadership in the management of the ten-acre farm. A retired army officer who took deep interest in the boy, and who knew of his ambition, mentioned the branches in which he must be well versed before he could pass the rigid examination after reaching West Point.

Among the things John Miley accomplished while driving to and from market was a complete mastery of the addition, multiplication, subtraction and division tables, and a fair knowledge of geography. This greatly sharpened his appetite for further learning, and it seemed easier for this boy with a heavy burden upon his shoulders to learn lessons on the market wagon, and by the light of a tallow dip at night, after a wearisome day's work, than it was for boys who had the benefit of teachers and freedom from cares.

The Reward of Self-Sacrifice and Hard Work

Finally, after six or seven years of his best efforts at self-education, young Miley was ready to contest, in 1883, for an appointment as cadet to West Point. He lived in the Illinois district then represented by Colonel William R. Morrison. There was to be a competitive examination. A dozen or more youngsters, the sons of bankers, legislators, judges, merchants and rich farmers, all graduates of high schools, were down for examination. They were present, dressed in the height of fashion, looking prim, bright and confident. Just before the session began, a tall, homely, awkward, plainly dressed young fellow entered the room and took a seat without an invitation. The others looked at him and laughed, one remarking that "Mr. Hayseed had evidently gotten into the wrong pew."

When the roll was called the awkward boy answered to the name of John D. Miley. His answer was the signal for another laugh by the graduates. "Wonder what Homespun expects here," queried one, while another said, "I wish I was as sure of getting the appointment as that hedge-fence is of missing it." Miley was always the opposite of handsome, and he knew it. He once said to a friend, "The good Lord made me as ugly as possible and then, for a finishing touch, hit me with a brick."

When the examination papers were distributed the boy from Belleville made a quick and easy task of answering the questions, and was watching the others work when the chief examiner asked:

"Are you stuck?"

"No, sir; I'm through," said Miley.

Then the examiner joined the boys in laughter. He and they supposed that the "hedge-fence" had given it up for a bad job.

After waiting some time for instructions, Miley asked when his papers would be examined.

"Not until the young gentlemen are through, too," replied the examiner.

"About when will that be, sir?"

"All will be ready to turn in their papers by the middle of the afternoon."

It was 11 A. M. "Any objections to my taking a walk about town, sir?"

"None whatever, if you will return."

John folded up his papers, put them in his pocket and started away.

"But you must not take your papers from this room. Put them in an envelope, seal it, and I will retain it until the others are ready."

The delegate from Belleville sauntered about town until noon, feasted on a ten-cent lunch, and at three o'clock reëntered the room to find a state of great confusion. The papers of all but two had been examined. It had leaked out that Miley was many points ahead. He had made no mistakes. An hour later all of the papers had been examined. There was a quiet consultation between the examiner and a leading citizen, who had been a professor in a college, and the examiner began to ask Miley all kinds of hard questions, every one of which he was able to answer promptly.

The market peddler had won on his own merits. No one had helped him. He had no political, social or financial pull. He left the room with a happy heart when the chairman of the examining committee told him that his was by far the best list of answers, and that Colonel Morrison would appoint him.

Nearly every one in Belleville knew John Miley, and the next day, when he reached home, he was showered with congratulations.

Heroism that Does Not Get Into Print

In 1887 Miley graduated with high honors, and in October of that year began duty as a Second Lieutenant in the Fourth Artillery. At the beginning of the Spanish-American War he was a First Lieutenant in the Second Artillery. He was on staff duty through the Cuban campaign as a Major of Volunteers, and distinguished himself in the battles about Santiago, winning promotion to Lieutenant-Colonel and Inspector-General of a corps. When he went to Manila there was almost no end of work for his branch of the service. He retained his early habits of industry and deemed himself able to overcome any difficulty, to wade through any amount of work. Early and late he applied himself to the mountainous tasks before him until he broke down and was sent to bed. After a few weeks of suffering the brave spirit of this gentle and genuine hero returned from whence it came, and all who knew him are mourners to-day.

The story is not complete. One of Colonel Miley's brothers lost both legs in a railroad accident. A portion of his salary as a Lieutenant was sent, each month, to the unfortunate brother. Another brother had been ambitious, from early boyhood, to go through college. The young army officer sent him through Yale. A few years ago the college graduate and his maimed brother went to California and took charge of a ranch which the army officer and his brother had run in debt for. It proved to be a great money producer, and was soon paid for. One year they divided $20,000.

Yes, indeed, Colonel John D. Miley was "material for a Major-General."

The Swiss Fleet

By W. L. Alden

GENERAL MURIAS, the President of Orizaba, ought to have been a thoroughly happy man. He was in the possession of unlimited power, and there was no danger that he would be disturbed by a revolution, owing to his foresight in shooting all the generals who might in time have become his rivals. He was in the prime of life and in excellent health, and there were nearly twelve hundred dollars in the treasury.

Nevertheless, there was a large fly in his ointment. A Swiss, living within five minutes' walk of the Presidential palace, had built a house which filled the President with envy. It was built after the model of a Swiss châlet—than which no model more unfit for a house in the tropics could have been devised—and it was even larger than the palace. Its grounds were a dream of beauty, at least in the estimation of both its owner and the President. In front of the châlet was a garden laid out with mathematical accuracy, in the midst of which was a fountain that threw water fully three feet into the air—when a negro worked a force pump concealed behind the house. There was a large china dog of the blue and yellow variety near the entrance to the garden, and there was also a model of the Jungfrau, ten feet in height and covered with whitewash to represent the eternal snows. Altogether the châlet was unique in Central America, and the President coveted it with fierce and sleepless desire.

The capital of Orizaba was situated on the seashore, and its little harbor was the only port in the whole republic. It was a small town; the Presidential palace, the Swiss châlet and the cathedral were the only buildings constructed of more enduring material than adobe brick. It had next to no trade, although a coasting steamer did visit it once every month, and it was haunted with fever to an extent which made it nearly uninhabitable to unacclimated foreigners.

Herr Schnitzer, the proprietor of the wonderful châlet, had settled in the town with the intention of developing a large trade in logwood. He was a strong, obstinate man, and he felt certain that in time the logwood trade would grow under his management to proportions which would be immensely profitable. So he took large quantities of quinine and went on his dogged way, setting the natives an example of energy and industry that made them ceaselessly bless the Madonna that they were born in a country where people were content to live reasonably.

One comparatively comfortable autumn afternoon the dissatisfaction of General Murias became intolerable. He arose from his hammock and swore a complicated Central American oath to the effect that he would take possession of that châlet without delay. Still, he was habitually a cautious man, and on this occasion he thought it would be well, before proceeding to action, to consult with his Secretary of State, who was not only a most astute man, but who possessed more education than the President and all the rest of his Cabinet combined. Don Cabañas occupied an office in the Presidential palace, and he at once answered the summons of his superior, who briefly informed him that he was determined to turn that pestilent Swiss out of his châlet and to confiscate it to the uses of the republic.

"Your Excellency is quite right," said the Secretary. "Only, you will permit me to suggest that we proceed in this matter in a way that will gain for us more than the mere possession of the châlet."

"Explain yourself, Don Cabañas," said the President. "Your counsel is always appreciated by me, even when I find it undesirable to follow it."

The Secretary bowed.

"Has Your Excellency," he asked, "ever looked at the map of Switzerland?"

"Never!" replied the General. "Why should I concern myself with maps of outlandish countries?"

"It is situated," pursued the Secretary, "nearly in the centre of Europe, and is surrounded on every side by other countries. Also, it is hundreds of miles from the sea."

"What has all that to do with this miserable heretic and his châlet?" demanded the President. "I do not wish to be instructed in geography, and I care nothing about Switzerland."

"Your Excellency is always right," replied the Secretary. "Yet on this occasion the geography of Switzerland becomes interesting. Let us suppose for a moment that Orizaba was at war with Switzerland. The enemy could not send an army here because no nation would permit a Swiss army to cross its territory—such action being an offense against international law. Also, the Swiss could not send a fleet here because Switzerland, having no seaboard, does not own a single vessel. Consequently, as Your Excellency perceives, Switzerland would be an admirable country with which to go to war."

"But I do not particularly want to go to war," said the President. "Do you suppose that if I put this Swiss in prison and confiscate his châlet, Switzerland will ever hear of it?"

"If I might be permitted to advise," said the Secretary, "I would suggest that we do nothing irregular. Let us declare war against Switzerland. Then we can confiscate the property of the Swiss on the ground that he is an enemy, and we can send him out of the country, which would be safer and more pleasant than it would be either to shoot him or to let him die in prison. Having declared war we could immediately lay a war tax, and the people would pay it before they could find out that there would not be the least necessity for spending a dollar in defense. We should have all the advantages of war, so far as confiscating the property of that miserable Swiss is concerned; we should gather in a respectable sum of money as a war tax, and we should be as secure from invasion as we should be if we declared war against the moon."

The President was overjoyed. He clasped the wily Secretary to his bosom and kissed him on both cheeks. Furthermore, he promised him that with the proceeds of the war tax the salary of the Secretary should be doubled. Then he sat down to write a declaration of war against the Swiss Republic, copies of which were posted on the blank walls of the capital and were recited in the streets by the town crier. That night Herr Schnitzer found himself in prison; and the châlet formerly his was occupied by a guard of soldiers and labeled, in large letters, "Government Property."

The population of the republic responded with enthusiasm to the call of their President, who assured them he relied upon their valor to repel Swiss invasion, and upon their generous contributions to defray the enormous expenses of the war. Little difficulty was found in collecting the war tax, and no less than half a dozen men volunteered to enlist in the army—a circumstance without precedent in the history of the republic, its army being uniformly recruited by the summary process of seizing able-bodied men and forcing them to bear arms. In short, the success of the President's action in declaring war was instantaneous and complete; and when, three days later, Herr Schnitzer was put on board the coasting steamer, which had touched at the port on her way up the coast, the President moved his personal effects over to the châlet, and felt that he had come into possession of it in a perfectly honorable and straightforward way.

When Herr Schnitzer was bundled over the side of the coasting steamer by two ragged Orizaban soldiers, the incident scarcely attracted the notice of the native passengers. To them it seemed quite in the natural order of things that handcuffed men, who had incurred the displeasure of Spanish-American Presidents, should be forcibly shipped to foreign parts. But there were two young men on board the steamer, who, being citizens of the United States, regarded the proceeding as something unusual, and were greatly interested in learning the nature of the crime committed by the angry man who had been violently thrust into their company. They promptly made the acquaintance of Herr Schnitzer, and when they had learned his story their sympathies were warmly enlisted in his behalf.

The elder of the two young men was the son of a great Wall Street financier, who had suddenly died after making a profitable corner in wheat, and had thus been able to leave his son a millionaire. Public opinion in America inexorably requires the millionaire to own a yacht, and, what is worse, to make cruises with it. This duty fell lightly upon young Hargrave, who was fond of adventure and really loved yachting. Having certain business interests in the Panama railway, which required his temporary presence at Colon, he combined profit with pleasure by starting on the voyage to Central America in his yacht, a steamer of some five hundred tons. An accident to the machinery compelled him to put into Vera Cruz for repairs, and, as it was found that the latter would consume more time than had been anticipated, he and his intimate friend Mason left the yacht in the hands of the machinists and took the coasting steamer to Colon and back.

When Hargrave and Mason learned that the President of Orizaba had declared war against Switzerland, merely in order to confiscate the property of Herr Schnitzer, they were filled with admiration.

"A man like that," exclaimed Hargrave, "is clean thrown away as a President. If he'd come to Wall Street he'd make the whole gang of us sit up, and he'd be richer than Vanderbilt in the course of twelve months."

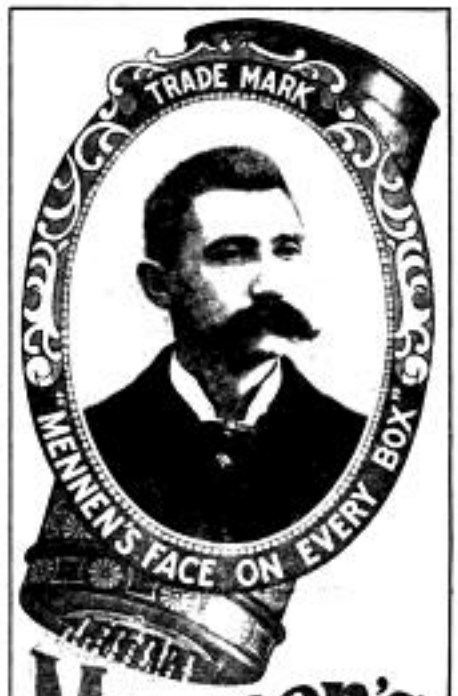
"Fancy his solemnly declaring war against Switzerland, and without any grievance, too," said Mason. "Now, if he'd traveled in Switzerland, and stopped at the Swiss hotels, it would be only natural that he should thirst for war. What a pity it is that there isn't any Swiss fleet, except in the comic opera. Now, that Orizaban scoundrel can confiscate Swiss property all day, provided there is any more within his reach, and nobody can bombard his towns and teach him to behave like an honest man instead of a shameless and habitual President of a mongrel republic."

"I don't see why there shouldn't be a Swiss fleet," remarked Hargrave, "or at all events a Swiss man-of-war. Did I understand you to say, Mr. Schnitzer, that the capital of Orizaba is on the coast, and that it isn't defended by any batteries?"

"There isn't a big gun in the place, sir," replied Schnitzer. "There was an old forty-two pounder, but they burst it last year firing a salute. That was the capital where I came on board, sir, and you saw for yourself that it was a seaport town."

"Mason!" said Hargrave. "It's my opinion that there is a Swiss fleet, or rather a Swiss cruiser, and that she's lying at this identical minute at Vera Cruz, waiting for her commander to arrive from Colon. If that frigate should suddenly appear in the harbor of President Murias' capital, and should propose to bombard the place unless an indemnity should be paid to Herr Schnitzer, don't you think Murias would be some considerably astonished?"

"Any one would be astonished at the sight of a Swiss man-of-war, but I don't exactly catch on to your remark about her lying at Vera Cruz. I didn't see anything there in the line of a seagoing steamer except this crazy old coaster and a British tramp."



"You didn't happen to see our yacht, for instance?" asked Hargrave.

"You don't mean to say that you're thinking of turning her into a Swiss man-of-war and scaring the hair off of that rascally President? By Jove! the idea is gorgeous. All the same, it's a little bit like piracy."

"That's what the lawyers would call it, but we don't propose to ask their opinion. Schnitzer says that there isn't a gun to prevent us from sailing into the harbor and anchoring a hundred yards from the President's palace. He'll never be anxious to mention that a Swiss frigate came into his harbor and made him disgorge his plunder; and we don't propose to write a book and describe the whole affair. We shall be perfectly safe, and we shall be doing a good deed in aid of a man who has been shamefully robbed. What do you say? Will you come along in the cruiser? I don't want to drag you into piracy against your will."

"Will a duck swim?" replied Mason. "Of course I'm with you. I don't care a hang about piracy so long as we are safe not to be caught. I haven't been a Wall Street broker for seven years to be scared at such a little thing as plain piracy."

"Then we'll consider the thing settled," said Hargrave. "Herr Schnitzer, make out a bill against the Republic of Orizaba for the value of your property, together with damages for interference with your business. You might add a few extras, considering that you're a Swiss, and extras always figure in a Swiss bill. Don't make the amount too large. We're honest men, and we can't rob Murias, even if he has robbed you."

On arriving at Vera Cruz the yacht was found to be ready for sea. Two small brass howitzers were bought and placed on the yacht's deck, where, in addition to her signal gun, they presented an unmistakably warlike appearance. The officers were provided with gorgeous shoulder straps and side arms, and the sailmaker was ordered to make a Swiss flag. Thus fully equipped for war, the yacht left Vera Cruz and started down the coast to harry the seaboard of Orizaba.

As soon as the yacht was out of sight of land her name was carefully painted out and the name Tell was substituted for it.

"Of course," said Hargrave, "it's a grave offense to change the name of a vessel without authority, but we needn't stick at trifling details. Let us hope that Murias hasn't managed to mount a gun for the protection of his capital. If he has, he'll have no trouble in sinking the Tell and in hanging all hands as pirates."

"Not at all," replied Mason. "He'll never dream that we are not regular officers of the Swiss navy, and he'll offer to exchange us for Swiss cheese or musical boxes. Fancy the astonishment of the Swiss Government on learning that it had a cruiser and that a choice collection of Swiss naval officers had been held as prisoners of war!"

"Have you seen Schnitzer's bill yet?" asked Hargrave. "Here it is. I told him that it was too steep, and he consented to knock off the charge for candles." Herr Schnitzer's bill was certainly, as Hargrave said, a little steep. He had charged three thousand dollars for his house, which was not altogether unfair, as it had cost him nearly two thousand. Then he had charged two thousand dollars for damages sustained by his business—an item which Hargrave also allowed to pass without objection. The remaining charges were: five hundred dollars for rent for the house while occupied by President Murias; two hundred and fifty dollars for the use of candles, and two hundred and fifty more for the view from the front windows. The two latter eminently characteristic items Hargrave struck out, and the corrected bill, which he intended to make President Murias pay, did not seem to him, in view of all the circumstances, particularly exorbitant.

About nine o'clock, one bright April morning, the capital of Orizaba woke up after a night of much patriotism and pulque, to find, anchored in their harbor, a man-of-war flying a strange flag. It was a red flag bearing in the centre a white cross, and it was at first asserted by the Archbishop, who had once visited Europe and was therefore held to be an authority on all European matters, that it was the flag of the Red Cross Association, and that the vessel which displayed it was a hospital ship, sent by charitable people to succor the wounded in the prospective fighting with Switzerland. When, however, it was pointed out that a white cross was not precisely a red cross, faith in the Archbishop's explanation vanished, and presently it was discovered that the red flag was the banner of Switzerland. It followed that the steamer was nothing less than a Swiss man-of-war, for no mere merchantman of Swiss nationality would have entered into an enemy's port. The panic which ensued was not lessened when a boat from the steamer, bearing a flag of truce, approached the landing-place. It was manned by four bearded seamen of truculent appearance, and commanded by a young officer gorgeous with gold lace and shoulder straps. He spoke Spanish with sufficient ease to make himself understood, and when he asked for a messenger to carry a letter to the President, there was no lack of volunteers anxious to have a share in the making of history. The letter inclosed Herr Schnitzer's bill, and contained a demand for its immediate payment under penalty of the bombardment of the town by the Swiss cruiser Tell. It was signed by Hargrave with a series of unintelligible strokes of the pen. This form of signature was an old trick which he had often practiced, while in Europe, for the benefit of Swiss hotel-keepers, whom he cordially detested. The surprising interpretations of his name, which resulted from the hotel-keepers' efforts to decipher the signature, had been a constant source of amusement to him.

President Murias was, as Hargrave had foreseen that he would be, a greatly astonished man. He had not the slightest doubt that the Tell was a Swiss cruiser, and that her commander would carry out his threat of bombarding the town unless Herr Schnitzer's bill was instantly paid. The fact that the Tell was anchored not more than five hundred yards from the châlet from which he had evicted Schnitzer made him fully realize the horrors of a bombardment. There was clearly nothing for him to do but to pay the villain's bill and to beg the Swiss Government to make peace. He immediately summoned his Cabinet and expressed his views of the Secretary of State with much freedom.

"You told me," he said, addressing that unfortunate statesman, "that Switzerland did not possess a single ship of war, and could not possibly get at us; but here is a powerful Swiss frigate that will knock our beautiful city and this Presidential palace to pieces unless we pay within two hours a preposterous sum of money to that accursed Swiss, Schnitzer. Now, if you have anything to say in your defense I will give you two minutes to say it in, after which you will go to prison for having basely deceived me, and plunged the country into a bloody war in order to carry out some private and rascally scheme of your own."

The Secretary of State did not make a success of his defense. He offered to produce his map of Switzerland in proof of his assertion that Switzerland had no seaport and that it was a physical impossibility that she should own a man-of-war. But the President sternly refused to look at any map.

"I do not care," he said, "whether Switzerland has a port or not. All I know is that there is a Swiss frigate lying opposite to this palace at this identical minute, and that it will begin to bombard us in an hour and a half unless the Captain receives four thousand five hundred dollars. You will now accompany the guard to jail, and if the Swiss Captain does bombard the town, and destroy you and the jail, you will only get what you deserve."

When the unhappy Secretary of State had been led away the President turned to the Secretary of the Treasury and asked how much money there was in his possession. It appeared that there were only three thousand eight hundred and odd dollars in the treasury, two-thirds of which were the proceeds of the new war tax, with which the President had intended to build an opera house. He therefore said that it would be necessary for the members of the Cabinet to contribute sufficient money to meet the demands of the Swiss Government, and he set the example by subscribing five dollars on the spot. The members of the Cabinet managed to make up the deficit, and the Secretary of the Treasury was then ordered to proceed on board the frigate with the money.

"You will say," said the President as he gave his orders to the Secretary, "that I have no quarrel with Switzerland, and that the declaration of war was all a mistake. Tell the Captain that it was a clerical error, and that the printer, who was told to print a declaration of war against Scotland, mentioned Switzerland by mistake. You will say, too, that I am ready to make peace at once, and beg that the Swiss Government will draw up a treaty to that effect."

The Secretary of State was carried off to prison, and the Secretary of the Treasury, carrying with him in a bag the entire contents of the national treasury, together with some three hundred dollars which was subscribed by the Cabinet, in order to make up the sum of four thousand five hundred dollars, paid a visit to the Swiss cruiser, where he was received with ceremony, and given a receipt for the money, signed with Hargrave's undecipherable signature. He was then gravely informed that President Murias' desire to make peace would be laid before the Swiss Government, and that peace would undoubtedly be made, provided the Orizaban Government would consent to a cession of territory, the payment of a war indemnity and the assumption, by Switzerland, of a protectorate over Orizaba. As soon as the Secretary had gone ashore to convey this surprising and depressing information to President Murias, the Tell steamed out of the harbor, and headed southeast until she was out of sight of land. Then her original name was restored to her stern, and as the yacht Mary she was put on the direct course for New York.

Herr Schnitzer was full of gratitude for the assistance given to him by Hargrave; and in consideration of a berth as purser of the yacht, which was offered to him, solemnly pledged himself never to mention the temporary existence of the Swiss frigate. Hargrave and Mason, after the first flush of exultation passed away, recognized the full legal meaning of their friendly act of piracy; but as Hargrave judiciously said, "There is no one who will tell tales except, perhaps, the Swiss, and if he does tell the story no one will believe him."

The Tendencies of Up-to-date Employers

By Charles M. Skinner

HUMANITY is approaching an average, and nobody is descending to adjust himself to it. The rage for education, sometimes carried too far, because it is apt to be one-sided, the fixing of culture as a social standard, the almost compulsory reforms that are worked through university settlements and religious and intellectual missions, the multiplying of technical schools, the urging of the multitude to abandon spirits, politics and profanity and to betake itself to symphonies, literature and old masters, are all tokens of a generous interest that moves the fortunate toward those whom they deem less fortunate. This estimate is not always right, because there is many a true-hearted gentleman who chews tobacco, eats with his knife and even wears scalps in his belt, and many an honest, helpful, motherly soul who talks and dresses loud enough to wake the Seven Sleepers, and who wears brass jewelry; but the efforts for the lifting of the race are at least well meant, and he is shortsighted or pessimistic who will deny that they have increased health, comfort, morality, intelligence and beauty.

One needs only to glance at social and industrial conditions of fifty years ago and compare them with what they are now to be convinced that the man who honestly fulfills his industrial destiny by toil of head or hand has little cause for tears. The drift toward betterment is so rapid that we can foresee the end of strife between Labor and Capital by the close of the twentieth century—if Capital survives the war upon it so long as that.

One can draw no other conclusion when he sees the practical gains that are made in bringing employer and workman together through the concessions by the former to the latter. They instantly increase loyalty, industry and economy, they minimize friction, they bring to the loom and the lathe and the bench an honest interest in the work. Head and hand are united. And it is all so easy! Recognize the humanity in the employee: that is all.

One of the first but hardest changes in faith and attitude that the employer must undergo touches the matter of hours. Until recently it has been hardly questioned that a man will do as much in one day as in another, and that he will do more in sixteen hours than in six. Great is the discovery that he will sometimes do more in six.

There is a certain amount of work in the normal man. Urged beyond his limit, he maintains a feverish energy for a time; then he suffers a depression that reduces his capacity by so much as to more than balance the gains of the recent excess. You may not draw on health and physical strength nor on willingness beyond a given point, any more than you may draw beyond your deposit in the bank, or on the water supply in your reservoir. Managers of great industries, and workers themselves who are tempted by extra pay, have been slow to recognize this fact, but experience has shown that when working overtime, artisans will increase their product for a month or six weeks, but after that they grow listless, tire quickly, and when the work ends it is discovered that the eight or ten hour output is equal to the output of twelve or fourteen hours. This of course implies that the overwork has been persistent for a season, because, in a spurt of overtime, a man or body of men will do more than in the regulation hours.

Now, it used to be the way in the various mills of this country—and in the old country it was worse—to begin work at the looms and anvils at six o'clock in the morning and keep at it till seven at night, except during twenty minutes for dinner at noon. And in some of the smaller mills the operative continued at his task until eight or nine o'clock. Life under such conditions was bare and hard; there was no beauty or joy in it; and for relaxation there was dissipating in such squalid resorts as in their mere appearance are depressing to those of established tastes.

In most shops work now begins at seven, pauses from twelve to one and closes at six, and in many others it begins at eight and ends at five. The Saturday half-holiday, too, is a success wherever it has been introduced, even when in order to obtain it the operatives consent to extend their hours on the other five days, so as to bring the week's work to a forty-eight or sixty-hour total. The whole of Sunday is hardly a fair offset to the lack of daytime in the rest of the week for shopping, theatres, music, visiting, puttering about one's yard, or riding one's hobby, and although to thousands of mechanics the half-holiday is merely a time of idleness, tavern-haunting and gossip, there are earnest fellows in every industrial centre who spend what time they can in reading-rooms, libraries, technical schools and museums, and others who visit the galleries and the parks, or take their wives and children to the beaches. Moderate hours and occasional holidays increase health and content, and therefore increase the efficiency of workmen.

Moderate hours do another good: They allow the worker to change his clothes. That, no doubt, seems to many a trivial claim, but it is not so. In our present state, wherein appearances count so greatly, clothes are the symbol, if not the proclamation, of the wearer's social state. There is a gain in conduct and character if a man is constantly and permissibly satisfied with himself. He will not take his best clothes into a kennel. He will feel most like a loafer when he looks like one. This is no apology for fashion, nor urging of sacrifice for outward show—only the insistence that when one is clean and fittingly garbed he is protected from some temptations and better represents his calling than does the patched, frowsy man with dirty face and greasy fingers. The latter may know more and may be a better workman, but the stranger does not suppose it, nor does the man suppose that the stranger will suppose it.

One political economist founds on this little defense, or vanity, of clothes, a principle, which is, that a pleasing appearance has a mercantile value, and that to secure it men are often willing to sacrifice a measure of money wages. In other words, the privilege of being clean and well dressed is a partial payment for one's work, and on this basis we can account for the preference of thousands of men and women for places at desks and behind counters, rather than for positions that are just as honorable, more useful, better paid and quite as interesting, but which are smoky or oily or which keep the worker immersed in smells. It is proper so to curtail or adjust his hours that for a little time every day or evening the mechanic may take his pleasure in the company of his fellows in a dress that will occasion no remonstrance and will allow him to believe that he is the equal of anybody else on earth—a proud and American privilege.

He will feel most like a loafer when he looks like one

Those employers who encourage even the show of self-respect among their men find their reward in it, and some go so far as to compel their hands to leave the shops in a state that will not be offensive to people with whom they may be thrown in contact in the street or on cars, stages or ferryboats. Other things being equal, the clean man is the best man.

Few employers of mechanics have reached the point where they allow vacations, but they sometimes permit a man to absent himself without pay for a week or ten days, especially in summer when business is slack. To be sure, not every man wants a vacation, or feels that he can afford one; but ninety-nine people in a hundred are better for a yearly outing, not necessarily a "lead," but a change of scene, habit, occupation and way of life, and, realizing this fact, more and more of the employers are conceding holidays to the wage-earners. Indeed, one or two instances have been alleged in which the employees have been literally turned out to grass, whether they wanted to go or not. In most factories the only holidays are New Year, Fourth of July, Labor day, Thanksgiving and Christmas. These are not enough. Allowing that the laborer has time for rest, he must have more: he must have time to grow and live.

Even from the orthodox standpoint of an industrial destiny, there must be something more in life than work; there must at least be a willingness to work, and if the willingness can be raised to an eagerness we are sure of the best results for workman, employer, buyer and producer. In far the greater number of tasks that men accept for wages there is no interest, and, therefore, there is only such willingness as may be looked for in one who must earn his supper before he can eat it. Assure that man who carries a hod or trundles a barrow that you have his welfare in mind and he will work more faithfully, unless your assurance be a mere verbal one.

And as an economic proposition, a soulless, business statement, it may be declared that service by the employer to the employed pays, not only because it secures willing service in return, but because it brings to the shop such a number of applicants for place that he can pick the best. Whereas in the old, dull days there was trouble in factories from petty thieving, idling, quarreling, waste of material and tippling (and is yet, where the old, dull methods remain in vogue), there are shops in which one finds such a corps of workers as in other times were impossible; not only sober, upright, self-respecting, but skilled and intelligent men and women, graduates of technical institutes, high schools and even colleges. The great shops that turn out electric machinery in Schenectady have scores of college men in overalls at the lathes and benches. The brains of such men are needed. The shop is an academy and holds scholarships for those who will win them. In the cash register works at Dayton, Ohio, none but high school graduates are accepted in the clerical or mechanical departments. In the soap works in another Ohio town a perceptible increase in steadiness, industry, order, economy and decency of home life was made in two or three years through the inauguration of a profit-sharing system. In several great factories and refineries the introduction of such simple matters as cleanliness of premises and baths for the laborers has had its effect on the morale, hence, on the character of the working force.

In few instances have these advances been made through the efforts of reformers or sociologists. In no recorded instance have sociologists proved that there is a sociology. The improvements have been made by practical business men as an investment, and they have paid a generous dividend.

Take their wives and children to the parks

An employer should first assure himself of the temper of his people. He cannot force them to adopt his ideas at their own expense. They must see advantages before they want them, for nobody wants what he has never known. For example, there is a mill in western Massachusetts which has a useless asset in a reading-room. It was built by the owner for his people, but, without consulting them, he proceeded to levy on their wages for the purpose of covering its expense and maintaining its usefulness. The employees properly objected.

Had they been asked, in the first place, they might have contributed the money, but the owner had no right to assess them without the asking. Nor must there be any affectation of patronage or charity in the bestowal of these favors; nor are those who receive them to feel that by accepting them they sacrifice a jot of their independence. They must take them as they take the soap and water and gaslight, as appurtenances of the place. Appreciation, thankfulness and reward will come in time.

Ingenious Young Mr. Opp

By Hayden Carruth

"A GOOD deal is being said nowadays about the causes of success or failure among young men in business," observed Judge Crabtree, "but I think it rests more than anybody suspects on the inborn capabilities of the young men. Some young men are just as certain to succeed as others are to fail. There was my young friend Opp, who lived up the State, and went to work in Bingtree's grocery. No wonder Bingtree's grocery to-day is Opp's One-Price Cash Emporium, and that he has put in a full line of fresh and smoked meats, boots and shoes, paints, oils and garden seeds, and millinery and fancy goods."

"Had a genius for groceries, did he?" inquired Major Dodge.

"Sugar increased in weight twenty per cent. when he looked into the barrel," returned the Judge; "butter renewed its youth at his touch, cabbages simply smiled with joy when he piled them up. Still, young Opp made his share of blunders when he began—perhaps more than his share. Bingtree was a harsh man, and used to rebuke his young assistant vigorously on the slightest pretext. One day he caught him charging up two pounds of lard, just sold to a good customer, to another patron of extremely doubtful paying habits. Bingtree told him that the next mistake would cause his instant dismissal, at the same time adjusting the lard error, and, as an object-lesson, putting down two pounds of butter just purchased by the doubtful customer on the account of the patron of sound bill-paying powers.

"The threat of dismissal made the young man nervous, and Bingtree had no sooner gone home than he made if possible a still worse blunder. This was nothing more nor less than spilling a couple of gallons of kerosene on the cigars. However, it did not greatly alarm him, as he thought that by leaving the case open during the night the cigars would dry out so that no harm would come of it—the young man was very correct in his habits and did not himself smoke. He then locked up and went home.

"But his sanguine expectations were not realized. Those cigars were soon producing considerable excitement among the village smokers, and speedily became a source of great alarm to the local fire department. They were the most inflammable weeds ever known in Toddville, and were almost immediately the object of investigation by the fire insurance agents, who threatened a general advance of rates. The peculiar qualities of the saturated cigars were not so noticeable during the day, but as darkness began to gather the landscape was lit up with their fitful glare, and produced a fine sight. Naturally vigorous complaint was made to Bingtree, and he, sagaciously suspecting his assistant, demanded an explanation. Young Opp was a very George Washington, and made a clean breast of it. The discharge which he dreaded came promptly, and Bingtree went home for the night. The young man locked up after him and went to his humble lodgings.

"The next morning Bingtree was surprised to find young Opp in his place as usual. Bingtree savagely demanded the reason, and the young man replied that as the cigars were now all right he had ventured to hope that he would be retained. Bingtree tried one of them and found that what he said was true. There was a slightly peculiar flavor about it, pleasant rather than otherwise, but its tendency to flare up and ignite the hat-brim was gone. Called on for an explanation, the ingenious young man said that he had sprayed the cigars with the patent fire extinguisher, using just enough of the liquid to counteract the kerosene. He was retained as assistant and the pleased and appreciative Bingtree raised his wages twenty-five cents.

"It was but a few years till Opp owned the store, and Bingtree went to California. As I intimated, the young man starting in business must be resourceful, and quick to meet an emergency, if he would succeed."

Literary Folk — Their Ways and Their Work

Mr. Friedman's Slum Studies

Mr. I. K. Friedman, the Chicago author who is scoring a decided success with his novel, Poor People, has two highly developed characteristics: absent-mindedness and sympathy with human want and distress. Nothing appeals to him so much as an opportunity to get a new view of the life led by the poor people of the big city. The fascination which this problem exercises over him and the ease with which he forgets all else when confronted by a chance to pursue his sociological investigations are illustrated by an incident which occurred while he was working on his latest story.

Late one afternoon he was introduced by a police reporter to "Sleepy" Burke, who, before his recent reformation, enjoyed a reputation for being one of the most skillful safe-blowers and all-round crooks in the West. The author and the reformed criminal immediately fell into a discussion of the "slavery of the slums," its causes and possible remedies. Fifteen minutes later found Mr. Friedman following "Sleepy" into the most desperate criminal resorts of the West Side. It was after midnight when the two returned. Meantime the management of a club before which he had engaged to lecture on Types of Honest Poverty had scoured the city by telephone and special messenger in a vain attempt to locate their absent-minded speaker.

This, however, was not the most unfortunate experience of the evening. From half-past seven a young woman had been waiting, hatted and gloved, for the author, who had engaged to take her to see Irving and Terry. A brief note easily made amends to the disappointed club; but three weeks of assiduous attention were required to propitiate the young woman into a spirit of full reconciliation and forgiveness.

Novelists Turned Playwrights

The old theory that novelists cannot write successful plays because they know nothing of the stage and its technique ought by this time to be fairly well refuted in the case of a number of our popular novelists. If they do not write good plays it must be found me other reason, for they see so much theatre rehearsing of their own dramas that they can no longer be called ignorant of the region behind the footlights. For example, when Mr. George Alexander's company was preparing for the London production of Anthony Hope's Rupert of Hentzau it was on a tour in the provinces. Nevertheless, Mr. Anthony Hope Hawkins left London and traveled with the company for over a fortnight, going to Edinburgh, Glasgow and Liverpool and seeing rehearsals every day. Mr. Hope is said to be a help at rehearsals, but to be on the whole chary of suggestions, ready to take the word of the experienced actor as to the suitability of certain effects and eager to learn all he can of stage technique.

When the new play by Mr. J. M. Barrie is presented in the autumn at the Haymarket Theatre, London, it will have been rehearsed by its author many times. Mr. Barrie has not had in the past much knowledge of the stage, but actors who have been rehearsed in The Little Minister, under the eye of its author, say that, in spite of this, Mr. Barrie knows exactly what he wants, and that what Mr. Barrie wants is almost inevitably, from a theatrical point of view, right.

Mr. Hall Caine loves nothing quite so well as the rehearsals of a play of his own, and he has an exuberant confidence in his mastery of the craft both of playwright and actor. When the rehearsals of The Christian were going on at the Duke of York's theatre Miss Evelyn Millard, who was to play the part of Glory Quayle, was so ill that for several weeks she was unable to come to the theatre. During this period Mr. Hall Caine not only told all the actors and actresses how things were to be done, but himself sustained the rôle of Glory. He did this in no half-hearted way, but lifted the corner of his coat as he danced gayly in the first act and wept tenderly on the shoulder of the actor who played John Storm. As it was, The Christian had but a short career in London. But it cannot be doubted that had Mr. Hall Caine continued his assumption, curiosity if not admiration would have kept the house full for many months.

Authorship by Proxy

There is an amusing story of a woman of title who found it difficult to understand journalistic methods when she first encountered them. The sister of a well-known and eccentric Scotch peer was traveling in Japan and the far East when she received a cablegram from a great metropolitan daily, "Would you accept £—— for series travel articles?" The lady was pleased, and replied by cable that she would send "copy" in a fortnight. She was, therefore, annoyed when the paper withdrew from its offer, cabling to her, "No need to send copy."

Dignified silence seemed the only way to treat such unbusinesslike methods. Many weeks later, returning, she found a parcel of newspapers and read with some astonishment several spirited and gossipy articles on the far East written, it was announced, by herself. Had not a letter inclosing a handsome check accompanied the parcel there might have been a considerable row. As it is, the lady accepts gracefully the compliments of friends upon her literary style.

An Industrious Gypsy

Miss Elizabeth Robins' present journey to the Klondike is only part of her habitual restlessness. One might, perhaps, hear that she lived in London, in Manchester Square. But Miss Robins herself says that she is an incorrigible gypsy. She rarely spends a continuous five days in what passes for her home. One hears of her staying in pleasant country houses here and there in England. The next moment she is on the Continent, perhaps merely sunning herself in the South, or going to Berlin or Paris for the new plays. After a flying trip to see Ibsen she will be found in England organizing a special series of theatrical performances, and probably playing in them herself.

The Boyhood of F. T. Bullen

Mr. F. T. Bullen, whose books of sea yarns are so well known, gave an interesting fragment of autobiography to a meeting of the Ragged School Union held in London this spring. He said that he knew well what it was to be a subject for the Ragged School Union; thirty-four years ago he was wandering the streets of London, a boy only eight years and a half old, without home or friends. After having been well brought up he was suddenly pitched into the street arab's life, was always hungry, always wanted a place to sleep, and most of all wanted work. Finally he got a job in a boot shop, and the first morning he scrubbed out the shop. The woman said she had never seen a boy scrub out a shop so well. She took him into her own sitting-room and gave him something to eat. He should have been happy for he had work and food. But in the room was another boy bigger than he was, and the woman kissed this boy and called him by affectionate names as she took him on her knees. And poor little Bullen burst into bitter sobs. He could not tell what was the matter when they asked him, for he did not know. Now he knows that it was because he wanted to be loved. Shortly after this he took to the sea, where although he did not find much he found some love. And later, in New Zealand, he found teachers.

Max Beerbohm's New Venture

Anything from the pen of Max Beerbohm is sure to promise entertainment. "Max," we can imagine, may subtly irritate, when the reader is not in a mood for his quips and conceits, but at least he has never learned to bore us. He is now to appear as a novelist, having just completed a long story. Lulelka Dobson it is to be called, and the very name spells satire.

The same writer, after giving us his mournful outlook upon the English drama for the last year or two in the Saturday Review, has also been trying his hand at a play, founded upon his own story, The Happy Hypocrite, which appeared originally in the Yellow Book and afterward as a booklet.

Mrs. Williamson's London Success

It is a curious thing that one of the most widely read novelists in England at the present moment should be an American woman who is probably scarcely known even by name in her native country. Mrs. C. N. Williamson has not, it is true, made for herself what is called a great "literary" reputation. She writes frankly for the million and succeeds in reaching them. The innumerable readers of the feuilletons in the half-penny morning papers of London such as the Daily Mail, and those who depend for fiction on cheap weeklies of enormous circulation such as Lloyd's, have no greater favorite than Mrs. Williamson. She has sometimes as many as three or four stories going at the same time in different papers and magazines. It has never been asserted that she took her art very seriously. It may well be that she laughs to herself as she subjects her poor but ravishingly beautiful heroines to the persecutions of titled villains. But she is a success, and that is probably all she wants.

Mrs. Williamson was Miss Alice Muriel Livingstone, of Poughkeepsie, New York. Her career began as an actress, and in her first novel, The Barn-Stormers, one will find much autobiographical experience. After acting for a time, Miss Livingstone turned her hand to journalism and came to London, in 1892, as the correspondent for four American papers. Her marriage to the editor of Black and White settled her in England, and she then took steadily, one can, perhaps, scarcely say seriously, to novel writing. One would have said, a priori, that one of the most difficult things for an American to do was to write stories for the middle and lower English classes which should suit their peculiar tastes. But this is another of the things the American woman can do when she puts her hand to it.

* * * Mr. Halstead can in a twelvemonth teach a young man that which he might not be able to discover for himself in years of unaided effort, groping in the dark. He can put upon a young man a trade-mark that will give him access to employment. No living journalist has a wider range of experience than Mr. Halstead. His school of journalism should be, and we take it that it will be, welcomed by the press everywhere; because, if systematically pursued, it will become the source of a much-needed supply of better educated and better equipped youngsters on the staff of the city editor and elsewhere in the well-appointed newspaper office.

COL. A. K. McCLURE

[In the Philadelphia Times.]

* * * Such a man at the head of a college of journalism should command a very high measure of success. * * * He fully understands the journalism of to-day as well as he understands the journalism of a generation ago, and it would be a priceless advantage for any young student aspiring to journalism to have the benefit of the training that Mr. Halstead would give in an institution organized for that purpose. We sincerely congratulate, not so much Mr. Halstead as American journalism, that he is about to establish the only journalistic school we have yet heard suggested that gives positive promise of the most substantial and beneficent results.

A Bubble Bursted*

Here is a sparkling and wholesome story which pricks the bubble of a young society woman's fascination for the life of the stage with exquisite neatness and skill. The spell is broken not by the ponderous onslaught of the purpose novel's broadsword, but a neat thrust of an instrument as delicate and unpretending as a woman's hat pin. A writer so clever as Mr. Matthews and so familiar as he with every phase of stage life could scarcely fail to make an interesting story from his theme; but very few could have wrought so artistic a piece of work as The Action and the Word. One scene in the story is notably charming in its sweet, domestic naturalness. This is where Evert Brookfield and his father, the shrewd and kindly old doctor, are waiting in the breakfast-room, the morning after Mrs. Brookfield's first appearance on the amateur stage. The men heard the rustle of a gown, saw the parting of the curtains, and then:

> A smiling baby was thrust through by invisible hands.
> "Say, 'Good-morning, papa!'" cried a voice from behind the curtains. "Say, 'Good-morning, grandpa! I'm a year old to-day. And don't you think I'm a big boy for my age?'"
> The child sprang up in his mother's firm grasp and held out his hands toward his father.
> As Evert crossed the room, his wife slipped her head in by the side of the baby's and scolded him playfully. "Naughty papa," she said; "naughty papa didn't remember baby's birthday!"
> "Oh, that's why you were so mysterious this morning, is it?" asked her husband.
>
> Then the young mother stepped inside the dining-room, and looked at the doctor reproachfully. "Naughty grandpa," she added; "he didn't remember, either. Never mind, baby; mama remembered. Your mama won't forget you even if your papa and your grandpapa are naughty and never think about you at all."
>
> The wintry sunlight fell on mother and child as she stood near the window, with the tall form of the grandfather rising above them. One ray made a halo about the boy's head, and another swept across her cheek.
> "Clap hands for grandpa!" she cried, suddenly kissing the baby in the neck, and then tossing him up and down in her vigorous grip.
> The baby cooed again, and tried to clap his hands; and Evert saw a dimple come in his wife's cheek and then disappear. That fugitive dimple also pleased him greatly, and he wondered why it was so rare.

The subtle growth of the stage passion, of the love of admiration and excitement in this charming, ingenuous and faithful but tempted young wife is traced with a delicacy which belongs to the true artist and analyst. The book will do good, for it will open the eyes of young women standing somewhat in the position of Carla Brookfield, and that, too, without letting them know it.

Robert Tournay†

As well might the critic attempt to define that which is impossible to the Infinite as to presume to place metes and bounds to the "human probabilities" of a romance of the French Revolution. In this bloody field all handicaps are off, and the author has always the right to plead that the historic facts of the Reign of Terror surpassed in fearful picturesqueness anything the modern imagination could possibly devise. It is therefore idle to attempt to quarrel with the marvelous procession of events—of perils, deliverances, acts of revenge and decrees of justice—which telescope into one another in the pages of Robert Tournay.

If writing romances of the Reign of Terror has its special privileges it also has its special perils. He who cannot fire the emotions of his readers with materials so combustible as the mad pranks of the Revolution afford is indeed a feeble literary incendiary. This charge, however, cannot be brought against the author of Robert Tournay. Perhaps the most apparent fault of the book is the stiltedness which seems to seize upon the leading characters at critical moments and stiffen them into putty statuettes with a "ten-twenty-thirty" vocabulary. When Robert, a Colonel in the army of the Republic, comes back to his old home to rescue Mademoiselle de Rochefort from the Republican mob he is greeted with this:

> "Do not touch me," she cried with a tone almost of terror. "I will hear no more. I cannot bear it. I cannot bear to see you. Go! for the love of Heaven, leave me."

Allowing for the social gulf between a young woman of the nobility and the son of her father's intendant, it is not a compliment to the intelligence of this flower of the aristocracy to put into her mouth so stupidly absurd a speech. There is, however, good character-drawing in the book. The cool bravery of St. Hilaire is well indicated by this little touch which describes his flight after being secretly warned of his approaching arrest:

> "A cat, that frequented the upper part of the building, walked silently in through the open door and, arching her back, rubbed purringly against his leg. He went to the cupboard and, getting out a saucer, filled it with the cream that was to have flavored his next morning's cup of coffee, and placed it on the floor. The animal ran to it greedily, and for a few moments St. Hilaire stood watching the little red tongue curl rapidly out and in of the creature's mouth as she lapped up the unexpected feast."

Situations are as thick in this romance as flowers in spring and there is a special crisis for every chapter. Altogether the book is good for a half day's lively entertainment.

—Forrest Crissey.

Glimpses of New Books

A better understanding of the loves and fears of the flowers, their insect foes and friends, their growth and culture, is presented in fascinating form by Neltje Blanchan in Nature's Garden, which might be called a popular guide to the flowers, and one accompanied by copious illustrations in color and line. Doubleday, Page & Co.

To preface a story with the words "a novel" is as if one should say, This is not a short story, a serial, a sample of summer fiction, nor any bit of the fluffy chiffon and pink organdy world; this is serious; this is written for posterity; this is a novel. Mr. Edwin Asa Dix writes in that spirit and—judging from the little notice of warning to the frivolous, posted on his covers and quoted above—with those convictions. Nathan Bradbury was a deacon of the church at the Corners, and as such lent his name Deacon Bradbury to Mr. Dix's book. Through one of those misunderstandings which will arise, he quarreled with his son, and, in the grief and shame that followed their separation, lost his faith in church and God. However, an outside attack upon his son's honor, which he was obliged to overhear, shook his confidence in the judgment which he had so strictly passed and sternly held, and from there the gradual progression to complete forgiveness, reconciliation and understanding were unmistakable. It is not blurted out but is gracefully left to inference. Such a determination to deserve rather than to please is always calculated to give the reader a fuller sense of duty accomplished than of pleasure won—but if Mr. Dix is uncompromising at least he is not patronizing. There are no homilies. The Century Company.

Most of us, remembering Horace Greeley's "Go West, young man, and grow up with the country," have become imbued with the idea that somehow or other the West, like the young man of the quotation, grew up of itself. Charles More in The Northwest Under Three Flags shows that such is not the case. "Many races united to people and build up the Northwest, and many interests were in conflict." Long before England took any vital interest in the great uncharted stretch to the west and north of her colonies, Versailles and Madrid followed keenly the relations of the Jesuit missions. The narrative begins with the landing of Jacques Cartier and, tracing successively the foundation of Detroit, the English counter-claims, the subsequent English occupation of the Ohio country, the fall of Quebec, Montreal and Detroit, passes through the Pontiac War, the conflicts of the Revolution and the War of 1812, to final peace under the Stars and Stripes. Harper & Brothers.

COACHING— Past and Present

By Alfred Stoddart

BETWEEN the coaching of the olden times and the coaching of the present day there are only a few points of difference, the chief of which is the matter of a hundred years or more between them. Next in importance is the difference between a stern necessity and a rare luxury. For the rest, coaching is much the same as it was in the eighteenth century, and the coachman's heart glories in the fact.

For though fashions in clothes, in books, art, and even in music, may come and go, the canons of good taste and "good form" in coaching, as in many other branches of sport, remain unaltered. In these days of automobiles, electric bicycles and all the aggressive modernity of the dawning century, your coaching enthusiast studies to mount to the box and gather up his reins in precisely the same style as his professional predecessor did in the good old days of "the road," and he will not tolerate a strap of leather which did not form a part of the harness of "the team" of the traditional mails of the old country.

Faithfulness to these old traditions is the true coaching man's foible, and it may be readily forgiven him in view of the healthful delight which he takes in the sport and the innocent pleasure which he shares with his fellow-mortals. Coaching is the least selfish of all sports, and even the so-called public coaches give a vast amount of pleasure to others besides their proprietors. Indeed, the latter afford to many a delightful opportunity to participate in a pleasure which would otherwise be beyond their reach — the novelty of seeing the country from the top of a swiftly moving coach, upon payment of a fee which is really a small one when the expense of maintaining the coach is considered.

Road and Park Coaching

Modern coaching is of two kinds: road coaching and park coaching — if the latter term may be allowed. Of the two, the former approaches more closely the standard of the olden times, and is considered by coaching men to be more "sporting" than the latter.

By road coaching is meant the driving of a coach and four over a certain route upon a stated schedule, and the booking of passengers for a money consideration. Please observe that the word "booking" is used in this connection. One may purchase a ticket for a railway journey or engage berths for a sea voyage, but one must always book one's seats for a coaching trip.

The route once established and the time card made up, it becomes a matter of rigid duty to the coaching man to observe his schedule punctually. No train dispatcher is more particular than he. Precisely at the time advertised he mounts to the box, gathers his reins and starts his train — not with a crack of the whip as florid writers are fond of saying, for that would be bad horsemanship, but skillfully he brings his four horses into action — and presently the coach is bowling merrily along through the city streets, into a park, perhaps, and hence to the open country, over the broad highway toward the first "change."

It was thus that Mr. Pickwick and his jovial companions traveled; it was thus that Tom Brown made his eventful journey to Rugby; it was for the rumble of the coach and the clatter of steel-shod shoes that many an anxious traveler waited at the cross-roads in the good old days, and as we bowl along merrily toward the old inn where we make our first change of horses it is not hard to imagine ourselves back in those days before the iron horse drove the more picturesque mail coach out of existence. Our coachman is a millionaire, perhaps, and this coaching venture is merely a fad of his, but what of that? The heart which beats beneath his drab box-coat is filled with the same desires and ambitions as was that of the elder Weller or any other of the old-fashioned knights of the road.

As we rattle through a little village and pull up at the inn for the first change, we note by comparing our watches with the time-card that we are on time to the minute.

Four sleek bays, already bridled and with their collars on, await our arrival, and the change is made almost in the time it takes to tell of it. Then a blast from the guard's horn signals "get ready," and we are off again at a smart pace.

It is pleasant to think that these same old inns once echoed with the noise and bustle of changing horses in the good old days when coaching was pursued in earnest, but — alas for the grim truth — coaching in this country in the last century lacked much of the picturesqueness of English coaching. Too often the "coach" was merely a stage wagon bearing no more resemblance than its four wheels afforded to the genuine mail coach. However, let us not pursue this inquiry too far. It is disturbing to the delightful flavor of antiquity which clings to coaching. Rather let us prepare to enjoy to its full measure the "galloping stage" which follows the next change of horses. On most coaching routes it is arranged to have one galloping stage where the road is best adapted to it. A team is chosen which works together well at this gait, and the effect is most exhilarating.

The Expense of a Costly Sport

The expense of maintaining a road coach is not inconsiderable. In the first place there is the coach, which costs from two to three thousand dollars; then the horses, at prices ranging from two hundred dollars per head upward, four for each stage and a few more for emergencies. These are usually sold at the end of the season — sometimes, if they are well selected, at a profit, as their work on a coaching route is thought to harden them and prepare them for private use. The amount of such a profit, however, is necessarily small in comparison with the other expenses — that of the harness, for instance, which must all be of the best, boarding the horses at the various "changes," wages and keep of grooms, helpers, and so on down the list. Besides the grooms in charge of the horses along the route, a professional coachman is usually maintained to supervise generally. He looks after all the minor details, sees that the horses at the "changes" are in good condition, and drives the coach if the owner or his friends do not care to do so.

Between a road coach and a park drag there is a wide range of difference. The former is built up for business, is heavier than the park drag by several hundred pounds, and is not finished so highly. Perhaps the most radical difference is the "rumble," or groom's seat on the rear. In a road coach this must always be solidly built of wood and must hold three persons, while that of a park drag is supported by irons and will hold only the two grooms.

The coaching set at the horse show

A road coach does not carry any grooms, their place being taken by the guard, who, however, is not supposed to have anything to do with the horses save in an emergency. The guard is a direct inheritance from the old coaching days when the mail was carried in this way. In those days the guards were employed by the Government and wore the King's livery—the scarlet coat which one often sees on coach guards in this country. Nowadays a drab frock coat is better form. The guard wears a low-crowned, wide-brimmed top-hat, usually gray with rough nap. He carries a leather case strapped over his shoulder for way-bills, the key of the coach, and so forth.

American Pioneer Road Coaching

Colonel A. DeLancey Kane was the pioneer of road coaching in this country. In 1876 he "worked" a coach between the Brunswick Hotel, New York City, and Pelham Bridge. This was succeeded by many similar undertakings, the members of the two coaching clubs—the Coaching Club of New York and the Four-in-Hand Club of Philadelphia being foremost in the ventures.

Perhaps the most ambitious project of all was the putting on the road of a double line of coaches between New York and Philadelphia, which was successfully accomplished several years ago by several members of the Philadelphia coaching set—Messrs. Edward Browning, Harrison K. Caner, Edward Morrell and Neilson Brown. The distance was made in something less than twelve hours, and a record was established for the longest coaching route of our times.

The New York Coaching Club's famous road coach Pioneer ran out of New York for many seasons, and this year the route will be from the Holland House to the Ardsley Casino—though the coach itself is a new Pioneer, the old one having been replaced. Messrs. Reginald W. Rives and George R. Reade are chiefly interested in this venture and are usually the whips. Mr. Frederic Bronson, formerly president of the Coaching Club, whose death occurred recently, was also associated in this venture.

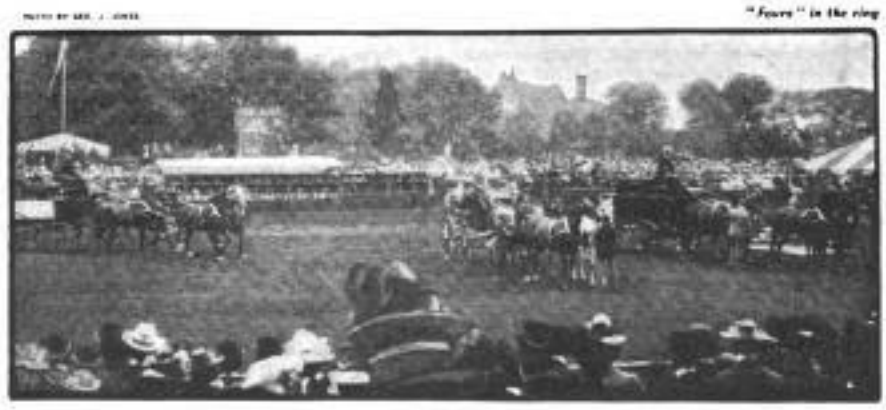
The smartly turned-out vehicles one sees in coaching parades, and usually those driven for pleasure in the parks, are park drags, so called, lighter in weight than road coaches, more highly finished and in more sober colors. There are also differences which are observed in the harness. The park equipage is more for show, whereas the road team is equipped solely for use.

The coaching parades—an idea borrowed from our English cousins—are picturesque spring fixtures with both the New York and Philadelphia coaching clubs. They are usually witnessed by great crowds, for the men are attracted by the spanking teams and the women are interested in the gay gowns of the ladies—fashion permitting unlimited license as to color on such occasions.

No branch of sport—save, perhaps, fox hunting—possesses a greater wealth of literature than coaching. The famous sporting writer, Nimrod, contributed several volumes to it, and there are many others of equal value. Mr. Fairman Rogers' Manual of Coaching, recently published, is the most comprehensive work on the subject ever written. Although a comparatively new book it has already grown rare, as most of the edition was destroyed by fire. Next in importance is the Duke of Beaufort's volume on Driving, in the Badminton Library. Edward Corbett's An Old Coachman's Chatter contains much of interest on coaching, while other volumes, such as Stanley Harris' Old Coaching Days and The Coaching Age, W. Outram Tristram's Coaching Days and Coaching Ways, Francis T. Underhill's Driving for Pleasure, and Stephen James Ferris' The Delights of Coaching, are standard works of reference.

Verse as well as prose has been inspired by "the chatter of the bars," much of it so excellent in its rhythm as to suggest itself unconsciously to the enthusiastic coachman,

"As he rattles along with eleven and four
And a petticoat on the box."



Rameses on the Road

THE recent illness of Miss Agnes Repplier, the well-known Philadelphia writer, made her friends all over the world particularly anxious. She is now on an extended trip abroad from which she hopes to return entirely strong.

She was dismayed about only one thing. She neglected to take Rameses with her. Rameses is a very small, very ugly stone cat. It was dug up by an Egyptian explorer and archæologist from the tomb of one of the famous mummies now in the museum at Cairo, Egypt. The mummy was supposedly a cat worshiper, and had this small image buried with him—for protection of his soul, no doubt. It was presented to Miss Repplier by a distinguished man of Europe some time after her book Agrippina had made its success. The cat was named Rameses at once.

Miss Repplier has so deep a superstition about its bringing good luck that she carries it with her always. For the first time in all these years she forgot the cat until she had reached the steamer and was outward bound. On her arrival on the other side she cabled at once to her sister that Rameses should be sent or brought over by a friend. Consequently the hideous little image, with his pedigree of centuries, was packed securely in cotton and forwarded.

Miss Repplier has thirty-nine images of cats that have been sent to her from all over the world. They are arranged on a carved table in her library. The framed picture of a famous cat hangs on the outside door of her apartments instead of a doorplate.

JOHN SHERMAN
An Anecdotal Sketch

A GREAT man's contemporaries rarely estimate him correctly. They see him too near and too familiarly, and cannot judge of the effect of his work, which is seldom immediate. What is said of him too often leans on the bias of his friends or the animosity of his enemies. The men who have brushed elbows with John Sherman know him for a great man, but how great he is or just what niche in the history of his country he will occupy is not for this generation to determine. This much may be said—and it is the estimate of one of his former colleagues: "He has been, without doubt, one of the most useful men to his country of his times."

John Sherman first entered Congress in 1855, and with the single exception of the four years from 1877 to 1881, when he was Secretary of the Treasury in the Cabinet of President Hayes, served continuously, in one House or the other, for forty-three years. For thirty-six years, from 1861 to 1897—omitting, of course, the four years just mentioned—he sat in the Senate. During this long term he held most important committee assignments. Both the Chairmanship of the Committee on Finance and the Committee on Foreign Relations, stations of the gravest responsibility, he filled with signal ability. But the crowning achievement of Mr. Sherman's career, the work by which he will be most remembered, was the reorganization of the disordered and shattered finances of the nation in the period of years immediately following the Civil War.

From the days when he and his brother "Cump," afterward General of the Army, were barefooted boys, he had been a close student of political economy and finance. The act of June 4, 1875, providing for the resumption of specie payments, gave Mr. Sherman his chance to effect what he had so conscientiously striven for. The purpose of the act, as he himself described it, was to "secure to all interests and all classes the benefit of a sound currency redeemable in coin, with the least possible disturbance of existing rights and contracts." To quote again from his own words: "To provide for the payment of a vast debt created during the war was next in importance to the conduct of armies, and those who were engaged in solving this problem were as much soldiers as the men who were carrying muskets or commanding armies."

Against this stupendous task Sherman pitted his energies with steady deliberation. On January 1, 1879, specie payments were resumed, nor have they been again intermitted from that day to this. Assuming direction of the Treasury Department at a time when affairs were in a state which can only be described as chaotic, when public confidence was shaken and the national credit was uncertain and unstable, at the end of four years he turned over to his successor a well-ordered machine, smooth and perfect in its working.

How Sherman Gained His Nickname

To his aid Mr. Sherman brought a nature instinctively methodical, and an unflinching probity. He saw to it that the public moneys were not squandered or used for dishonest purposes. A claim for a million dollars was once brought to him for his signature. It had been regularly allowed, but it was illegal and he refused to sign.

"It has been allowed," insisted the claimant's attorney, "and you must sign it."

"I will not," repeated Mr. Sherman; and he did not. He would have resigned, he afterward confided to a friend, had it been required of him, sooner than even seem to sanction a fraud.

Neither would he permit irregularities. The chief of a bureau one day came to him for an order to pay for some machinery.

"Has it been advertised?" asked the Secretary.

"No," said the chief, "but there are only two places where it can be made, and we are accustomed to get their bids and contract with the lowest."

"But," said the Secretary, "the law says it must be advertised."

"At least this may pass, for it is made and we need it."

"I cannot help that; the law says it must be advertised, and advertised it must be." And advertised it was, at a very large saving to the Government.

This was the ceaseless attention which gained Mr. Sherman the name of "Watchdog of the Treasury." Traveling in Europe some years ago with a courier who could speak almost any language better than English, he happened to meet General Oates, since Governor of Alabama, and for a few days they traveled in company, the courier embracing General Oates in the esteem he had already acquired for his distinguished employer. But one day he approached Mr. Sherman in high dudgeon. His affection for General Oates had turned to hatred, and in voluble if broken English he said:

"That man, sir, was not your friend. He call you, sir, a watchdog. Yes, sir, a watchdog. He has but one arm or I would chastise him; yes, sir."

Throughout these years of effort to make every dollar of American money equal in value to every other, he plainly foresaw the economic forces which were to result in the great financial campaign of 1896 culminating in the victory of Mr. McKinley. His speeches and reports of that day, like those of twenty years later, were arguments for an honest dollar. It was Sherman, also, who as Secretary of the Treasury first directly offered to the people the bonds of the Government, theretofore always negotiated through an association of bankers. During the last two years of his term as Secretary he funded the national debt into four per cent. bonds by popular subscription—a wise policy that until recently has been more honored in the breach than in the observance.

The Unfulfilled Ambition of Sherman's Life

Interwoven in this fabric of high purpose and nobly won achievement runs the darker pattern of disappointed ambition. Like Blaine and Webster, Sherman was destined never to attain his most cherished hope. Justly or unjustly, he has always been known as a cold, hard, unsympathetic man. Certainly he has never shown that warmth and magnetism which won and held the public love to those two tragic figures. "Statuesque," as has been said of him, he may have been, but hardly heroic. In his own mind Mr. Sherman was at no loss to whom to attribute his defeat; he blamed the treachery of the politicians whom he had trusted. After one of his defeats before a national convention he was sitting in the room of the Committee on Foreign Relations when the dispatch came announcing the nomination of one of his rivals. "The New York delegates have betrayed me again" was his bitter comment. Again, in 1888, he openly charged that his nomination was rendered impossible by the venality of the delegates.

It is interesting to turn to the record of his earlier days. The story of the boy Sherman is not the least pregnant in the chapter of the statesman's life. In it may be read the deep lead of affection which brought a man thought unsympathetic and self-centred to honor and preferment. When he was only six years old his mother was left a widow with eleven children. His first earnest desire was to help care for her, and throughout his young boyhood this was his controlling ambition. It inspired him to intense application and, knowing that everything he learned brought him nearer to the goal of his ambition, he progressed much more rapidly than his comrades. To this day he cannot speak of his mother without emotion.

At the age when most boys are just beginning to do earnest work, this ambition finally prompted him to leave school and secure employment that he might contribute to the family income. He was only fourteen when he accepted the position of junior rodman on Muskingum River. The same spirit of chivalry won him regard as a fighter, one quick to defend himself and whomsoever he thought entitled to his protection. In those days it was William Tecumseh, the elder brother, one of the doughtiest warriors of this century, who was the man of peace; and if the neighbors had been asked to prophesy the career of the two boys they would have given William the toga and John the sword. The love and friendship of the Sherman brothers was beautiful in its uninterrupted constancy, and, though they were widely separated through all the years after they grew to young manhood, "Cump" a soldier and John a statesman, nothing was allowed to break the bond. A voluminous correspondence was maintained between

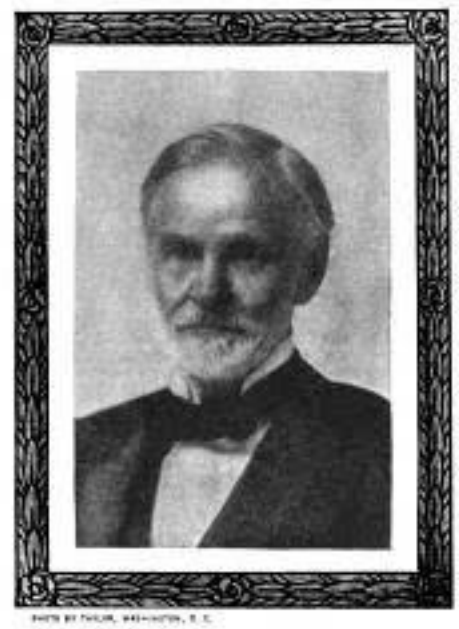
Sherman's Strength in Debate



His early lack of a completed education has sometimes made itself felt. Despite wide reading and an undoubted mastery of his own department, his spoken utterances occasionally betrayed it. In his speeches he persisted in calling Canada, "Canady," and Cuba, "Cuby." It was during Cleveland's second term that some phase of the Samoan question was under debate and Sherman was holding the close attention of a full Senate and crowded galleries. The word Samoa seemed to bother him, and he pronounced it in three or four different ways. Finally determining upon Sammyo, he continually referred to Sammyo and the Sammyans, to the great amusement of his auditors. At length, little Senator Spooner, who sat next to him, sidled up with an apology for the interruption. He stood on tiptoe and, pulling the orator's head down within range, whispered in his ear. With a grave bow and most serious expression of countenance Sherman repeated, "Yes, yes, Samoa, Samoa," then going on with his speech in two minutes was saying Sammyo and the Sammyans again.

Inability easily to concentrate his mind upon the special issue of the subject under discussion was always Mr. Sherman's weak point in debate. Even in discussing financial questions he would sometimes stammer and stumble until it would be painful to attempt to follow him. At his best his delivery was marked by earnestness and sincerity, his presentment was lucid, swift and logical, and everywhere apparent was his broad, general knowledge. Heard in Congress or from the stump, his addresses and shorter speeches made scores of converts. No doubt his lack of humor went along with his deep reserve in keeping him just beyond the border-line that cuts worship from respect. Like Nelson Dingley, Mr. Sherman would not know a joke if he met one on the street. Senator Hoar is a distant relative of Mr. Sherman, and always calls him "Cousin John." It is told of the two cousins that they were driving in the country when, on crossing the tracks of an electric railroad, they fell to talking about horses and how easily some of them take fright. "Cousin John" was loud in the praises of the black and brown pair behind which they drove—they were "kind, sound and shapely," but they would occasionally get nervous at an unusual noise behind them. Suddenly Mr. Hoar clutched Sherman's arm with a look of terror: "Talk lower, Cousin John; the horses might run away."

"That's so," said Sherman, and continued his eulogy in a whisper.

There was something commanding about his indifference to Senator Spooner's corrections, something dignified and quite self-forgetful which disarmed malice; but from other and more delicate positions his enemies did not let him off so easily.

Despite his manifold public activities, Mr. Sherman found time to amass a private fortune. He foresaw the future of the Capital City and built up scores of small houses on side streets. One street bearing his name stands solid with his houses. It seems typical of the man. With little of the meteoric and dazzling in his personality, his inner self ran strong and true in deep channels of pure affection and worthy aspiration. Chivalrous to his mother, the intimate of his brother, devoted to his wife and their adopted child, it could trouble little a life so full and rich that his acquaintances should have misnamed a fine reserve.

HON. JOHN SHERMAN

Mr. McKinley as a Teamster

THE Major drew heavily on his cigar and then watched the ring of fire fade into the ash again. When he spoke it was in the tone of a man who knows his story.

"Thirty-seven years ago I wore the red stripes and the red star of an ordnance sergeant and, at the battle of Antietam, had charge of the ammunition for a brigade. I had taken the ammunition train as close to the fighting line as was allowed until orders for ammunition were received. Two of the best teams and most reliable drivers were placed by the side of the road and kept in readiness to move at a second's notice when the call for cartridges should come.

"Well, the expected order came about eleven o'clock. 'Whip your teams into a dead run!' was my command, and I did it. We hadn't gone more than five rods when a commissary sergeant, in charge of a wagon, cut into the road ahead of us. I shouted to him to haul out.

"'I'm going to the line, too,' was his reply.

"'But I have the right of way—ammunition always has.' At that moment we came to a wide piece of road.

"'Drive past if you want to, but I'm not going to stop to let you,' was the comfort the youngster gave me.

"'Pass him!' was my order to the drivers. That meant a race, and a race it was until we reached a fork in the road. Then the commissary sergeant took one road and I took the other. My men soon reached the brigade detail to rush the ammunition to the line. When the two loads were disposed of, orders were given to return and be in readiness for another trip. If I remember rightly, those drivers used the lash more freely in getting back under partial cover than they did in the effort to pass the tenacious commissary sergeant. Bless me, but it was hot! A dozen brass bands couldn't have made more music than did the bullets, shot and shell Lee's men were throwing that way.

"Not long after the battle an order was issued doing away with the brigade ordnance sergeants and giving each division of three or four brigades an ordnance sergeant. Our brigade commander sent for me. When I reached his quarters he spoke of the race in a very sober way, as though it were a serious affair, and said that the division commander had directed that I report to him at once. I began to think that the race had in some way gotten me into a scrape, and when I reached the division commander I was mighty uncomfortable. I was sure, for one thing, that the commissary sergeant had reported me.

"'Sir, I am directed to report to you.'

"'Ordnance sergeant of the ——st brigade, eh?'

"'Yes, sir.'

"'Engaged in a race the day of the battle?'

"'Yes, sir; I wanted to get the ammunition to the boys as soon as possible.'

"My voice was unsteady and I must have looked scared, but the general reassured me—he had selected me for division ordnance sergeant, and I was directed to report for duty that evening."

"Did you ever hear anything about your fellow-racer, the commissary sergeant?" asked some one.

"Yes, I have heard a good many things about him. His colonel thought that a commissary sergeant who would carry cooked rations to his comrades on the fighting line through such a storm as prevailed at Antietam would make a good lieutenant, and a few weeks later he was promoted. I heard from him, direct, not many months ago."

Thereupon the old Major displayed his last commission, saying, as he did so, "the gentleman who signed that bit of parchment as President McKinley was the commissary sergeant."

Oddities and Novelties of Every-Day Science

The Cur Made Useful

Secretary of Agriculture Wilson says that in Nebraska nowadays the skins of superfluous dogs are tanned and made into gloves—a plan which affords a valuable suggestion, inasmuch as every large community kills off great numbers of curs annually, the hides of which might just as well be utilized as wasted. Dogskin, of course, is one of the best materials for gloves, and for this purpose we import hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of canine pelts annually. In Manchuria and on the eastern borders of Mongolia, where the severe cold develops a beautiful growth of hair, are found thousands of flocks of young dogs. There is a great demand for both dog skins and dog hair in northern Asia. Many of both go to Paris, where they are tanned. A bride in Mongolia or Manchuria commonly receives a number of live dogs as wedding presents, and her husband, taking them home, kills them, using their hides to make carpets and bed-covers.

Suicide in the Animal Creation

There is no longer question of the fact that the impulse of suicide is by no means confined to human beings. Many of the lower animals deliberately destroy themselves under certain conditions—such, for example, as imprisonment, which seems to give them an abhorrence of living.

It is impossible to keep a fur seal alive in confinement because it will invariably starve itself to death, refusing food. Rather odd it is that such should be the case, inasmuch as the hair seal is so remarkably tractable an animal—fond of its human master and quick to learn tricks. Dogs have been known to refuse food and starve to death at their masters' graves, but grief rather than an intention of self-destruction may be accountable in such instances.

A more humble creature, the sea cucumber, which is related to the starfishes, will destroy itself on very small provocation, out of sheer ill temper apparently. If disturbed by handling or otherwise, it is apt to throw out its entire digestive system, or else to break itself into pieces.

The oft-told tale that a scorpion will sting itself to death if surrounded by a circle of fire is a fable. And there is no truth in the notion that venomous snakes bite themselves when angry; indeed, as has been satisfactorily proved, they are proof against the toxic effect of their own poison. On the other hand, the crab has a way of amputating its own arms, and does not hesitate to throw one of them away if it happens to be slightly injured.

This self-mutilation of the crab is not accomplished by detaching the limb at a joint, as one would naturally suppose, but the fracture is made in the length of the upper arm, at a point where it is small. Examination of the member will show that Nature has provided for such amputation in a very curious way; a little cut, like the scratch a boy makes across a stick of candy to break it, is distinctly observable at the point mentioned. When Mr. Crab wants to get rid of a claw, he throws the arm backward with a jerk, and it snaps off.

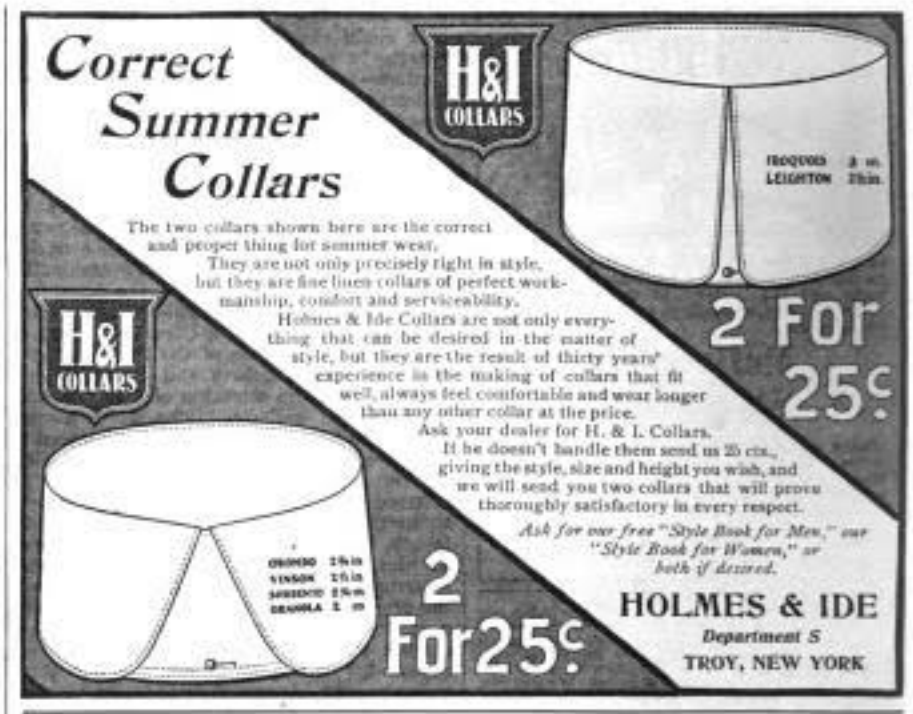
It is said that a crab can be made to relinquish a limb in this fashion simply by tickling the claw; but, whether this be true or not, it would appear that Nature's object in making the provision described is to enable the crustacean to free itself from the encumbrance of an injured and useless member. The sacrifice made by the creature is in no case very serious, inasmuch as the claw is soon replaced by a new one, equally complete, though smaller. Lobsters and crawfish have the same power of amputating their own limbs.

A fox will gnaw off his own leg if it is caught in a trap, and a wolf will do the same thing. The so-called glass snake, which is really a lizard, will drop its tail and leave it squirming in the grass, while the reptile itself seeks safety by crawling off unobserved. The "praying mantis" is addicted to the practice of chewing off its own toes, while it is almost impossible to secure a perfect Barbitistes serricauda, because the creature, when it finds itself held, bites off its front legs instantly. A scarabæus beetle native to Florida, when caught, dies in the hand of its captor almost immediately—apparently of intense nervous excitement.

The Demand for Emeralds

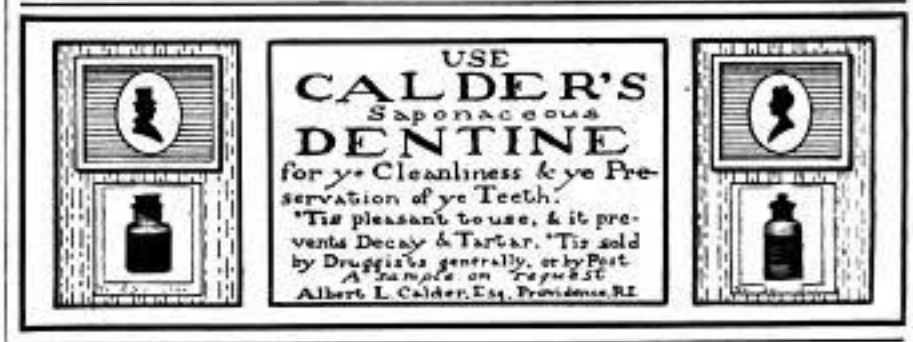
Emeralds have risen one hundred per cent. in value recently, and the market for these gems is in a flurry. United States Consul McNally at Bogota, Colombia, which is the centre of the trade, reports the presence there at one time of seventy-five foreign dealers, all eagerly seeking the green stones and offering unheard-of prices for them. The excitement, he adds, has led to the pillaging of church treasures, the statues of the saints being robbed of many fine emeralds with which they were adorned.

Owing to the scarcity of emeralds, and the consequent great demand for them, ancient mines are being reopened and worked—notably at Habachthal in the Tyrol, which is understood to have been a source of the gems in very early times. At Mount Zabara, in Upper Egypt, deposits which furnished the world with the bulk of its supply of emeralds two thousand years ago have been attacked anew, a French traveler named Caillaud having rediscovered them not long ago.



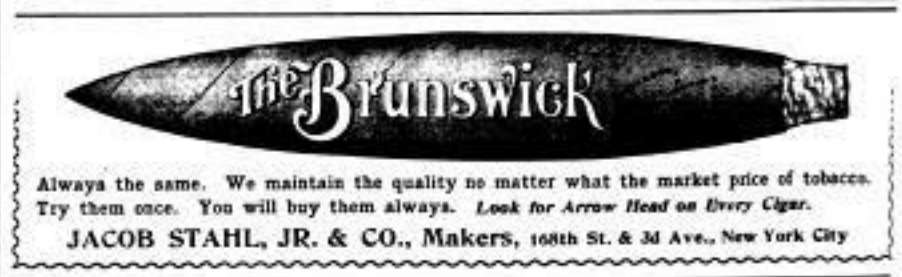
The principal source of emeralds to-day, however, is the famous Muzo mine, in the Andes, eighty miles northwest of Bogota, situated in a deep valley. This mine was worked by the aborigines many centuries before the first coming of the Spaniards. In those ancient days there was an extended traffic in emeralds among the natives, and large numbers of the gems of Muzo found their way to Mexico and Peru, where they were greatly prized. At the present time the mine is the property of the Colombian Government, which rents it to a company.

Cortez sent to Spain in one batch two large boxes of emeralds, most of which came from Muzo, one of the cases containing forty thousand carats of the gem. Many of these stones were beautifully cut by Mexican lapidaries in the shape of flowers, fishes with eyes of gold, bells with pearls for tongues. Mr. Kunz, the expert in precious stones, says that in the Temple of the Sun at Cuzco, Peru, there was an image of the sun with disk and rays of gold, set thick with emeralds. This prize fell into the hands of Pizarro, who gambled it away.



Unfortunately, the two boxes of emeralds collected by Cortez were lost, the ship that carried them never having been heard of again. He himself took to Spain some very fine stones of this kind, however, and it is believed that a few of the most valuable ones now in the royal treasury at Madrid represent a part of his plunder. Consul McNally says that the natives in the neighborhood of the Muzo mine have adopted lately a rather curious expedient in their eagerness to procure emeralds for sale to the foreign buyers. They encourage their flocks of chickens to stray about the workings, in the expectation that small but valuable gems may be found later in their crops.

The emerald is simply a green beryl, and is only precious when it happens to be found of the right color and free from flaws. Beryls of hues other than green may be bought for a trifle, and there is plenty of true emerald that is worthless by reason of flaws and lack of proper color. In the National Museum at Washington is a single crystal of beryl that weighs one thousand one hundred pounds, but it is valueless as gem material, and is interesting only because of the huge size of the crystal.



An emerald of the finest quality is considerably more valuable per carat than the purest white diamond, being second in worth only to the ruby. The recent advance in price has brought upon the market many old emeralds of great beauty, which the owners have been induced to sell, while the scarcity of the stones is causing an active search for them in every part of the world. This year's report of the Geological Survey, just issued, states that considerable quantities of light-colored emeralds are now coming from New South Wales. A few first-rate ones have been obtained from the neighborhood of Stony Point in North Carolina; they are of a beautiful light-green tint, and occur in red gravelly clay, the matrix from which they were originally derived being certain rocks of the Blue Ridge. Some of them have been dug out of pockets in the rock at a considerable distance beneath the surface.

History records that an emerald the size of an ostrich egg was owned by the ancient Peruvians, a religious homage being paid to it. It was called the Goddess of Emeralds, and was exhibited by the priests on occasions of festival only. Pizarro was curious to know whether it was real or not, and so tested it with a hammer, the result being it was smashed into bits. Even at the present day it is an accepted notion among the ignorant that the verity of a diamond or other gem may be determined by hitting it with a hammer. If it withstands the shock, it is all right; otherwise not. In this way many a valuable diamond has been destroyed, the fact being that precious stones, though extremely hard, are very brittle. The story goes that Disraeli was on one occasion badly frightened when by an accident he dropped the Koh-i-noor, which was handed to him for examination by the lapidary engaged in recutting it.

In the Hall of Private Audience, in the palace of the Mogul Emperors at Delhi, stood the celebrated Peacock Throne, the estimated value of which was $30,000,000. It was constructed by a Frenchman named Austin, who had sought refuge at the court of Shah Jehan, and it derived its name from two peacocks which spread their tails behind it, the vivid colors of the birds being represented by precious stones of appropriate colors. The throne itself was of solid gold inlaid with rubies, emeralds and diamonds, and between the peacocks was a life-size parrot carved from a single emerald. When Delhi was sacked by the Persians, in 1739, the throne was broken up, its materials being carried away as loot, but what became of the parrot nobody knows.

In the treasure-house of the Shah of Persia is a terrestrial globe three feet in diameter, which is said to have been used by the last monarch of that country for the study of geography. It is entirely covered with gems, of which there are 51,366 in all, reckoned at a total value of $5,000,000. The various countries of the earth are represented in precious stones of different colors, while the oceans are of emeralds. A vase in the imperial treasury of Austria is made of a single emerald, weighing 2680 carats, which is said to have been formerly the property of Burgundy, and in the government museum at St. Petersburg is a stone of the same kind a foot cube in size. These, however, are not gems of the first water.

Eleven beautiful emeralds help to adorn the state crown of Great Britain, which was worn by Queen Victoria on the occasion of her coronation. She has never worn it since, but whenever she has visited the House of Lords it has been borne before her on a cushion, being taken out of the regalia-room in the Tower of London for that purpose. In addition to the emeralds, the crown contains 2783 diamonds, 277 pearls, sixteen sapphires and four rubies, the total value of the gems being reckoned at $550,000, without counting the priceless great ruby which belonged to Edward the Black Prince and the famous sapphire purchased by George IV. At her drawing-rooms the Queen wears a tiara, made in 1862, which is her personal property and is constructed especially for use with a veil. It is a light shell of gold, incrusted with 2673 brilliants and 525 rose diamonds.

The emerald, like the diamond, has been reproduced in the laboratory, though to call the artificial gem a counterfeit would not be correct, inasmuch as it has all the qualities of the natural crystal. To produce it, natural emerald of poor quality is mixed with boric acid and a small quantity of oxide of chromium with the aid of heat. The chromium gives the requisite color, while the purpose of the boric acid is merely to dissolve the oxide. When the mixture cools, crystals of true emerald are formed out of it. Unfortunately, they are too small to be valuable, the achievement being interesting scientifically, but of no commercial use.

QUICK COOKING

Better cooking in half the time—that explains the popularity of the Detroit Jewel Gas Range. Its economy and convenience are apparent when you light the burners and put the food in the oven and on the top—and cooking begins at once. No patient building-up of a solid fire. No long waits for a "hot oven." No long watching of a pot that won't boil. No waste of fuel. And then well ask, for he's more like a street waufie than onything else. On a day like this, and when I see what a sight he's made of himself in two hours, I could almost wish he had been born a girl."

"Losh keep us, Mistress Chalmers, ye mauna speak like that, for it's no chancy he micht be taken away sudden, and ye would have regrets; forbye your laddie's naithing to my Archie, for the last time I saw him, as I'm a livin' woman, there wasna more than two inches of his necktie left, and he was fishing his new Balmoral bonnet out of the water-barrel in the playground. Ye needna expect peace if the Almichty give ye laddies, but I wouldna change them for lassies—no, I'll no go that length."

And the two matrons sustained themselves with the thought that if their boys were only a mere wreck of what they had been in the morning, other people's boys were no better, and some of them were worse, for one of them had inflicted such damages on his trousers that, although he was able to face the public, he had to retire as from the Royal presence; nor was it at all unlike the motherly mind to conceive a malignant dislike to the few boys who were spick and span, and to have a certain secret pride even in their boys' disorder, which at any rate showed that they were far removed from the low estate of lassies.

The great function of the day came off at two o'clock, and before the hour the hall was packed with fathers, mothers, sisters, elder brothers, uncles, aunts, cousins, and distant relatives of the boys, while the boys themselves, beyond all control and more dishevele than ever, were scattered throughout the crowd. Some were sitting with their parents and enduring a rapid toilet at the hands of their mothers; others were sitting in clumps and arranging a reception for the more unpopular prize-winners; others were prowling up and down the passages, exchanging sweetmeats and responding (very coldly) to the greeting of relatives in the seats, for the black terror that hung over every Seminary lad was that he should be kissed publicly by a maiden aunt. Mr. Peter McGuffie, senior, came in with the general attention of the audience, and seated himself in a prominent place with the Sparrow beside him. Not that Mr. McGuffie took any special interest in prize-givings, and certainly not because the Sparrow had ever appeared in the character of a prize-winner. Mr. McGuffie's patronage was due to his respect for the Count and his high appreciation of what he considered the Count's sporting offer, and Mr. McGuffie was so anxious to sustain the interest of the proceedings that he was willing, although he admitted that he had no tip, to have a bet with any one in his vicinity on the winning horse. He also astonished his son by offering to lay a sovereign on Nestie coming in first and half a length ahead, which was not so much based upon any knowledge of Nestie's literary qualifications as on the strange friendship between Nestie and his promising son. As the respectable Free Kirk elder who sat next Mr. McGuffie did not respond to this friendly offer, Mr. McGuffie put a straw in his mouth and timed the arrival of the Provost.

When that great dignitary, attended by the bailies and masters, together with the notables of Muirtown, appeared on the platform, the boys availed themselves of the license of the day, shouting, cheering, yelling, whistling, and bombarding all and sundry with pellets of paper shot with extraordinary dexterity from little elastic catapults, till at last Bulldog, who in the helplessness of the Rector always conducted the proceedings, arose and demanded silence for the Provost, who explained, at wide intervals, that he was glad to see his young friends (howls from the boys) and also their respected parents (fresh howls, but not from the parents); that he was sure every father and mother was proud of their boys to day (climax of howls); that he had once been a boy himself (unanimous shout of "No" from the boys); that he had even fought in a snowball fight (loud expressions of horror); that he was glad the Seminary was flourishing (terrific outburst, during which the Provost's speech came to an end, and Bulldog arose to keep order).

One by one the prize-winners were called up from the side of their proud parents, and if they were liked and had won their prizes with the good will of their fellows, each one received an honest cheer which was heartier and braver than any other cheer of the day, and loud above it sounded the voice of the Sparrow, who, though he had never received a prize in his life, and never would, rejoiced when a decent fellow like Dunc Robertson, the bowler of the eleven and the half-back of the fifteen, showed that he had a head as well as hands. When a prig got too many prizes there was an eloquent silence in the hall, till at last a loud, accurate and suggestive "Ma-a-a-a!" from Spiug relieved the feelings of the delighted school, and the unpopular prize-winner left the platform amid the chorus of the farmyard—cows, sheep, horses, dogs, cats and a triumphant ass all uniting to do him honor. It was their day, and Bulldog gave them their rights, provided they did not continue too long, and every boy believed that Bulldog had the same judgment with themselves.

To-day, however, the whole gathering was hungering and thirsting for the declaration of the Count's prize, because there never had been such a competition in Muirtown before, and the Count was one of our characters. When he came forward, wonderfully dressed, with a rose in his buttonhole and waving a scented handkerchief, and bowed to everybody in turn, from the Provost to Mr. McGuffie, his reception was monumental and was crowned by the stentorian approbation of the Sparrow's father. Having thanked the company for their reception with his hand upon his heart, and having assured the charming mothers of his young friends of his (the Count's) most respectful devotion, and declared himself the slave of their sisters, and having expressed his profound reverence for the magistrates (at which several bailies tried to look as if they were only men, but failed), the Count approached the great moment of the day.

The papers, he explained, upon his honor, were all remarkable, and it had been impossible for him to sleep, because he could not tear himself away from the charming reflections of his young friends. (As the boys recognized this to be only a just compliment to their thoughtful disposition and literary genius, Bulldog had at last to arise.) There was one paper, however, which the Count compared to Mont Blanc, because it rose above all the others. It was "ravishing," the Count asserted, "superb"; it was, he added, the work of "genius"—the river, the woods, the flowers, the hills, the beautiful young women, it was all one poem. And as the whole hall waited, refusing to breathe, the Count enjoyed a great moment. "The writer of this distinguished poem—for it is not prose, it is poetry—I will read his motto." Then the Count read, "Faint Heart Never Won Fair Lady," and turning to the Provost, "I do myself the honor of asking your Excellency to open this envelope and to read the name to this distinguished audience." Before the Provost could get the piece of paper out of the envelope the Sparrow, who was in the secret of the motto, jumped up on his seat and, turning with his face to the audience, shouted at the pitch of his voice through the stillness of the hall, "Nestie Molyneux." And amid the great shout that went up from the throat of the Seminary could be heard, full and clear, the view-halloo of Mr. McGuffie, senior, who had guessed the winner without ever seeing the paper.

An Unpatriotic Scot

THE accuracy with which Sir Walter Besant describes places has often been noticed by critics and readers. It appears in his latest novel just brought out in New York as markedly as in all the long list of its predecessors. It is due to a habit Sir Walter has long had of taking leisurely walks through the places he uses in his stories.

"I find," he said to an American reporter who recently met him, "that there is a world of fun as well as of interest in a walk through a city to any one who keeps his eyes open. It has long been my practice to take a stroll first through one quarter and then through another. As you walk along you constantly meet things which connect you with the past or which bring up famous scenes and characters in literature or history. When you pass the Ludgate Hill station, where the crowds come and go unceasingly, it is hard to realize that six centuries ago there was a great monastery where the station building now stands. Still more wonderful to a lazy student is the little place known as Black Raven Alley, Upper Thames Street. The name comes from an ancient inn, which once was famous for good cheer. It was opened by a Scotchman who took the Raven as a badge of the old Scotch Kings, who in their turn had taken it from the Norsemen, who regarded it as the symbol of wisdom."
